This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

"ST. PATRICK AT TARA."
CANTATA.
By PROFESSOR GLOVER.
Dedicated by permission to
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ARTHUR PATRICK.
Price 3s.; bound in cloth, gilt, 5s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.
"The publication of Professor Glover's Cantata, 'St. Patrick at Tara,' will be gladly welcomed by choral societies, requiring a work of moderate difficulty but extensive interest. The subject, essentially national in character, is, moreover, one that could scarcely fail to awaken the attention of most people, but more especially Irishmen, who will doubtless see that the spirit of the ancient bards has not entirely passed away from the more prosaic times. For freedom of melodic treatment and characteristic harmony Mr. Glover's Cantata deserves to be widely known. There is a special interest attached to the work, inasmuch as H.R.H. Prince Arthur Patrick has been pleased to accept the dedication of a theme which treats of a period of ever-living interest."—Morning Post.
"This cantata, it may be remembered, was performed at St. George's Hall last year, and was remarkably well received. It has now been published in a convenient and elegant volume, uniform with Professor Glover's edition of Moore's "Irish Melodies." The theme of the cantata is the introduction of Christianity into Ireland, and the poetical selections set to music are taken from the works of Ossian, Moore, Clarence Mangan, and other poets. The peculiar and distinguishing characteristics of the composition consist in the intermingling of music of a national with music of a sacred description, which produces a striking and not unpleasing effect. There are several pretty melodies in this cantata, among which a contralto solo, "I often wish," and a bass song, "Lord have mercy upon me," stand out conspicuously. As the execution of "St. Patrick at Tara" does not present any formidable difficulties, we should say it is likely to become a favourite with amateur choral societies, as well as with their audiences."—The Echo.

"SWEETHEART WALTZ."
FOR THE PIANOFORTE.
On the popular song, "My Sweetheart when a Boy," (beautifully illustrated.)
Price 4s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street.
THIS New and Charming Waltz will be played at the ADELPHI THEATRE, nightly, under the direction of Mr. Edwin Ellis.
At the Spa Concerts, SCARBOROUGH, under the direction of Herr Meyer Lutz.
At the Royal STRAND THEATRE, under the direction of Mr. John Fitzgerald.
At the Royal Assembly Rooms, MARGATE, under the direction of Mr. Spillane.
"Mr. Wilford Morgan is to be congratulated. Singer, actor, and composer, equally pleasure-giving in each capacity; but, for choice, most admirable as composer. His song, 'My Sweetheart when a boy,' is one of the most popular of its time; and upon the song he has founded the 'Sweetheart Waltz.' If English composers and publishers would give us more such there would be less scope for going into ecstasies over the German school of dance composition. The leading theme is charmingly fresh and tuneful in its waltz tempo; and the subordinate subjects—if they may be called subordinate—are equally piquant and graceful. The 'Sweetheart' will be as popular in the ball room as 'My Sweetheart' is in the concert room; and as a study or practice piece it can be heartily recommended to young or average executants, who will be pleased by sweet melody, and profited by musicianly arrangement and good harmony."—Brighton Guardian.
"This set of waltzes is by Mr. Wilford Morgan, having been founded by him on his popular song, 'My sweetheart when a boy,' which has frequently been sung in Belfast, and invariably well received. They keep strictly to the melody, and are very skilfully put together, and are altogether much above the average of such compositions. Mr. Morgan, who is an old favourite in Belfast, accompanied the Royal Italian Opera Company during both their visits to this town. 'The Sweetheart Valse' has been published in a very tasteful form."—Northern Whig.
"This is a very elegant and melodious waltz, founded on the song of 'My sweetheart when a boy,' which has deservedly become exceedingly popular, and which is also the composition of Mr. Wilford Morgan, a member of the opera company at present amongst us. The waltz is admirably adapted for dancing, is clear and brilliant, and presents no insuperable executive difficulties to pianists of ordinary acquirements, & by no means unattractive feature, whilst it is written in a highly musicianlike manner, and is a very pleasing piece for drawing-room performance."—Liverpool Daily Post.

COMIC OPERA IN VIENNA.*

With the opening of the new Operahouse in the year 1869, Vienna obtained one of the most magnificent theatres, if not the most magnificent theatre, in Europe. The scenic splendour unfolded before the eyes of the spectator corresponds to the brilliancy and large size of the building. It is only on a stage of such gigantic dimensions, only with such rich stores of machinery and scenery, and only with so extraordinarily strong an orchestra, chorus, and ballet, that such representations are possible as those we see of Meyerbeer's, Gounod's, and Wagner's operas in the new Operahouse. There was, however, one reflection, one regret which this magnificent edifice immediately provoked, namely: that comic opera—Spieloper,—would not be able to exist there; that, in so large a space it would necessarily prove ineffective, just like too gentle a voice, or too delicate a face. The three years since elapsed have justified this apprehension. At first, Spieloper was almost completely banished from the bills; the artists had quite enough to do with grand opera. The expedient was then adopted of playing smaller operas one or two evenings every week in the old Kärntnerthor Theatre. This plan, which Herbeck especially intended carrying out thoroughly, proved highly successful. The public already felt acutely the loss of their favourite merry operas of less pretensions than the show-pieces; when a man had revelled to his heart's content in gorgeous display and mass effects for several evenings in succession at the new house, he was glad enough to get back once more to the old one, and refresh his over-strained senses in the clear flood of joyously melodic music. Operas such as Mignon, Der Freischütz, Fra Diavolo, and La Dame Blanche, now appeared to exert a double attraction; nay, they commanded far more grateful audiences than they had ever commanded before. Such was the re-actionary influence of the new grand Operahouse; people began to be really very fond of the small one. In a feuilleton of the Neue freie Presse, of the 7th July, 1869, I advocated the expediency of the new Operahouse being restricted to ballet and grand opera, and of Spieloper finding a permanent home in the old Kärntnerthor Theatre. I said that it ought at least to remain there until a new house was especially erected for works of this class, less pretentious than the others, but no less dear to art. I asserted that the whole collection of comic and conversational operas, of social and emotional musical pieces, with spoken dialogue, belonged to such a theatre, and ought to be cherished with as much care as the operas in the new house. "This rich and remunerative field of art will gradually," I said, "require to be cultivated apart, and the principal characters will demand a special company; it will, in course of time, be not a mere gap, but the rival of 'Grand Opera,' as much respected and as much run after. It is to be hoped that, simultaneously with the growth of the population, the wealth, and the artistic wants of Vienna, this branch of art may be developed into a separate and independent institution, which—either under a manager appointed by the Court, or a private individual—may occupy the position held by the Opéra-Comique, and partially by the Théâtre-Lyrique in Paris.† Such a consummation is probably still far distant, yet it cannot be otherwise than advantageous even now to keep our eye upon it, and gradually shape our course towards it." Shortly afterwards, in September, 1869, I concluded a similar article with the words: "The more probable it appears that, in our new Operahouse, everything not grand spectacular opera and ballet is doomed to oblivion, the more must we exert ourselves to bring about the erection of a second and independent operatic theatre, on the model of the Opéra-Comique."

The temporary employment of the old Kärntnerthor Theatre for some of the more favourite "Spiel" operas, was of short duration. In consequence of the inscrutable resolve of high, nay, of the highest, authorities at Court, the Kärntnerthor Theatre was "definitely closed;" the scenery and properties most hurriedly sold; and the irrevocable condition: that a theatrical performance should never be given in it again, imposed on any one offering to rent or buy the building. The only result of this step, surprising even in the "empire of improbabilities," a step by which the venerable Kärntnerthor Theatre was, as it were, secretly made away with, under the darkness of night, without a word of farewell, and without a formal last performance, was that the new house now became the sole refuge for comic operas. Some few were produced there, but with very moderate success. However well selected the cast, and however carefully got up the work might be, the public always felt that the new edifice was not the place for delicate musical comedies and conversational pieces. The confidential charm of the dainty genre pictures by Auber, Boieldieu, etc., was lost in so wide a space. The strides of the performers, the movements of their arms, were of necessity on a larger scale; their gestures were more exaggerated, and their conversation more strongly marked, than they should be in Speiloper, and than they certainly would have been upon a smaller stage, You did not feel warm or at home, and all the notices the papers gave of these performances commenced with the inevitable sentence about the little done for comic opera at the new Operahouse. In a feuilleton of the 19th June, 1870, I felt bound to confess that, even for operas like Joseph and Les Deux Journées, though the new Operahouse might be a possible, it was, by no means, a favourable, locality. "Much less"—I went on to say—"can we hope that it will be so for comic opera properly so called, which demands a far more delicate facial play, with more rapid and more pointed treatment of the dialogue. After a few trials, works of this description will, probably, be quickly withdrawn from the Theatre. For this reason we regret the abandonment of the old Kärntnerthor Theatre, which it was originally intended should be retained for smaller and lighter operas. We do not doubt, however, that the long and short of the matter will be that some one will start a separate scheme of comic opera in Vienna. Just as the latter—which, in a night, has grown up to be a leading European capital—has increased her dimensions, a second and smaller operatic theatre has become a necessity. If Paris has three Lyric Theatres (not counting the Italian opera, and four or five Vaudeville Theatres, which play Offenbach), Vienna may well prophesy that she soon will have a second. This will, perhaps, emulate the career of the Théâtre-Lyrique, which began very modestly, but which, thanks to considerable talent, and a good repertory, attracted the public, obtained a State subvention, and was raised to the rank of an Imperial Theatre." It is time that I should apologise to the kind reader for these quotations from myself; I did not make them without an effort, but, also, not without good reason. I wished to show that I repeatedly and earnestly urged the foundation of a separate Opéra-Comique in Vienna, at a time when there was not the most remote prospect that the wish would be realised. At present that an enterprise of the kind has been launched on sure conditions, by an association of gentlemen interested in art, and that it will soon be in active operation, I feel as though I were a kind of intellectual midwife, and that it is my pleasing duty to introduce the novelty to the reader.

"Komische Oper," the name selected for the new theatre, is recommended by its being a literal translation of "Opéra-Comique." It is, also, meant to be interpreted in the same way as the title of the famous Paris Theatre which cultivates musical comedy, but by no means exclusively. As we are not so strict in the clauses of our theatrical patents, or licenses, as the Parisians are, the "Komische Oper" will be able to extend its repertory, and give small operas (such as L'Elisire and Don Pasquale), containing recitative, or requiring a ballet. It will be able to go from Grétry to Lortzing, from Dittesdorf to Offenbach. The entire rich opera-stock of German, French, and Italian, composers is open to it. A plan, long followed in France, and lately adopted in Italy, so successfully, of reviving classical buffo operas will, at the "Komische-Oper," go hand in hand with the production of the latest efforts of talented and known composers in the same branch of art. Who has not felt fresh interest in the performances of the Paris Opéra-Comique, every time he has attended one? From the days of old Johann Fr. Reichhardt, who wrote letters from Paris at the end of the last century, down to Eduard Devrient, Otto Jahn, and Alfred von Wolzogen, all German connoisseurs in art have greatly preferred the smaller theatre to the Grand Opera—and from personal experience I must fully endorse their decision. An institution so firmly rooted in the country, and boasting so old and noble a lineage in art as the Opéra-Comique, cannot, it is true, be equalled immediately by a new German enterprise. But if the Vienna Comic Opera, with the same object in view, does but half as much as the Paris Opéra-Comique, it cannot fail to command the sympathies of the public.

* From the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

† As most persons are aware, the Opéra-Comique produces not only comic works, properly so-called (such as the works of Auber, Adam, etc.), but serious and half-serious operas, which—like the old German Singspiel—contain spoken prose, but have neither ballet nor large masses of chorus-singers. Of this class are Méhul's Joseph and Cherubini's Deux Journées; while among the more modern specimens may be cited Zampa, Lalla Rookh, Mignon, Dinorah, and others. At the Théâtre-Lyrique, in addition to a few grand operas, the repertory consists principally of works, such as Der Freischütz, Die Entführung aus dem Serail, Martha, Lucia, and La Traviata, by German and Italian composers, which have become popular in Paris.

The principle of the division of labour, a principle permeating modern life in science, art, and industry, asserts its right on the stage as well as elsewhere. A theatre which, like our new Opera-house, is intended for the brilliant representation of grand opera, and planned, even to the smallest details, with this object, cannot possibly cultivate Spieloper to the same extent and with the same success. Even were the attempt made, the means would be wanting. Singers of grand opera, chosen principally for their strong, enduring voices, and passionate delivery, are, as a rule, unfitted for light conversational opera, and become more so every year, as grand opera reigns more exclusively in the theatres to which they belong. It is only in a separate and permanent theatre that anything special—a style, a school of singing and of acting—can be cultivated for comic opera. But for the Opera-Comique in Paris, the most talented and charming artists, Madame Ugalde and Montaubry, Couderc and Berthelier, together with many others, would never have been what they were; they would have languished away at the Grand Opera, in a subordinate position. It is thus, at the present moment, with numerous artists in Germany; intended, by the nature of their voice and of their ability for comic opera, they screw themselves up to be only middling Verdi and Wagner singers, because it is only as such that they can hope to make their way. If the Comic Opera, Vienna, is fortunate at starting, there is no doubt that artists with the peculiar kind of talent required will flock to it from all parts of Germany, and gradually become masters in their branch of art. Just as every young theatrical aspirant with a voice devotes himself to grand opera, nearly every musician in Germany, who happens to have, or not to have, an idea, sets about composing a heroic or tragic opera. Where could he get a comic opera produced? And, supposing it be brought out, how doubtful and short is its probable career? In Paris, the case is different. The necessity of novelty for the Opéra-Comique and the Théâtre-Lyrique keeps the process of production going, and the mere existence of these theatres has caused many a composer, whose graceful talent would have been thrown away on a tragic subject, to adopt a lighter style, and more suitable sphere of action.

We may expect a similar influence to be exerted by the Comic Opera in Vienna; we hope it may gradually put an end to the fearful sterility in the field of musical comedy in Germany, and give a strong impetus to the composition of comic operas.

THE LIVERPOOL EISTEDDFOD.

(By the "Porcupine's" own Welsh Reporter.)

Christmas was a great day for Wales. The capital of the Principality, and especially the jerry-built houses, trembled to the foundations with delight at the grand gathering of bards in the concert-hall, which was crowded to its utmost capacity by enthusiastic Cambrians. Among the distinguished company we noticed 650 John Joneses, 427 William Williamses, and 209 John Hugheses, while just a few Pughs and Prices were judiciously sprinkled among the audience, to vary the monotony of the nomenclature. On Mr. J. Jones being moved to the chair, a question arose as to which J. Jones was intended for that honour, and 549 J. Joneses were for vacating the building when they found out that the real J. Jones wanted was the barrister. The confusion having been quelled after some difficulty, the whole company joined in the glorious national anthem, "Taffy was a Welshman," the allusion to that hero's little delinquency being slightly modified, in consideration of the day and the occasion. The interesting Eisteddfod was then proceeded with, Mine-dog and Mad-dog, the celebrated bards, prominently shining in the competitions.

MUSIC IN FLORENCE.

Florence, Dec., 1872.

Before giving you an account of musical matters here, I beg to remark, in reference to the notice lately published in your columns about the production of Tannhäuser at Bologna, that, while, after the first performance or so, a report spread like lightning through the Italian papers that the work was a failure, even those journals which, from blind passion or false and exaggerated patriotism, cried out thieves and murder louder than anyone else, at present acknowledge not only its value, but also its success. Every evening, at every performance, things have taken a more favourable turn. The overture, the finale of the second act, and the air, "O du mein holder Abendstern," are now always encored. I have great satisfaction in stating this, especially on account of that highly meritorious and indefatigable conductor, Signor Mariani, who, with a degree of patience and self-sacrifice, of which we really cannot form a correct notion in Germany, got up Lohengrin, last winter, in so masterly a manner, and produced it with marked and undisputed success at Bologna and Florence.

With regard to musical matters here, as Florence hitherto has neither seen nor heard any concerts—it is not till later in the season that concerts enliven us—the only topic for consideration is what has been doing at the theatres. To begin with the first, the Teatro della Pergola, it has preserved this year the reputation it has enjoyed for many years previous of being the worst of all. People thought that this season it would experience no difficulty in rising in public opinion, because Madame Krauss, who has been singing with tremendous success at the San Carlo, Naples, was engaged—but—but what is one good singer, if all the others are exceedingly mediocre? The same ill-fortune still attends the theatre. This is not only something to be deplored, but something to be severely reprehended as well, for the Teatro della Pergola is the only theatre which enjoys a considerable grant both from the State and the Corporation. It would almost seem as though the management considered that the grants in question relieved them from the trouble of any self-exertion.—With regard to the performances and the success achieved, the Pagliano is the leading theatre. In rank it is the second, but in size, the first. Mdme. Papini, as prima donna, has been playing Norma to overflowing houses, and amid unparalleled applause. The same holds good of Lucia, I Vesperi Siciliani, and I due Foscari. With the Elisir d'Amore, the Teatro Nazionale attracted very numerous and appreciative audiences. There were always recalls for Signora del Nobolo, the prima donna and the bass-buffo, Baldelli. The Teatro Rossini, which, like the one just mentioned, belongs to the smaller theatres, has hitherto produced only more recent works, opere buffe, such as the Nuovo Figaro, and Chi dura vince, by Signor Ricci, as well as Gosto e Mea, by Signor de Champs. These opere buffe achieved a very pretty amount of success, and it is only to be hoped that the young musicians who composed them, will continue to follow the same path. Even though the music be not original, it is light, smooth, melodious, and correct, which is something where young composers are concerned. Signor de Champs, a native of this place, despite his French name, studied here under Mabellini, and, with his industry, will probably some day be known far beyond the boundaries of Florence.

It is probably no news for you that Mdlle. Aglaja Orgeni has been here for the last fortnight, and has sung the part of the heroine ten times in Lucia di Lammermoor, at the Teatro Nuovo. But you may not know that, on the very first evening of her appearance, she achieved a very great success, which has gone on increasing with every performance. After the first air in the first act, she was uproariously applauded, and twice recalled. After the duet in the second act, she was again recalled. In the ensuing concerted finale, the public accompanied the clapping of hands with cries of "brava," applied to Mdlle. Orgeni exclusively. I myself like to feel engrossed in the plot as well as in the music; to give myself up to the enjoyment, completely undisturbed by external circumstances, of the opera as a work of art; such being the case, I am an enemy of applause, which so often destroys aught like illusion, and scares away the spell exerted over our fancy by the Ideal. But, when applause is once the established rule, I think it is a very sensible thing for anyone, instead of shouting out a meaningless "bravo," to avail himself of the delicate variations possible in the Italian language, and in virtue of which "bravo" applies to a male artist, "brava" to a female artist, and "bravi" to several, or all the artists, for instance, in a concerted piece. Once again did I admire the cadences, variations, and embellishments which the lady introduced into different passages throughout her part, as, for example, in "La vita a noi sarà," and "Fia bello il ciel per me." By these means she achieved a brilliant triumph. She was rewarded by enthusiastic cries of "brava," which seemed as though they would never finish, and, at the end of the third act, by four recalls before the fall of the curtain—a compliment to be the more highly valued as the Italians are by no means partial to hearing the "bella e soave" music of Donizetti, a composer they so greatly respect, "botched" (as they express it) by absurd "manierismi." What can I add? Mdlle. Orgeni is well known in Germany; she has long enjoyed a high reputation. Seven years ago she made her début at Berlin, then, too, appearing as Lucia. Unfortunately she left too soon. Could not Herr von Hülsen once more attract her northwards?

You announced in your last number the death of Signor Francesco Lucca, the Milan music-publisher. The sad event was quite unexpected, and is universally regretted. The important and far-spreading business conducted under his name was raised by him to its present eminence from very small beginnings. His whole life was one uninterrupted course of active exertion. How generally he was esteemed and loved was satisfactorily proved by the procession which accompanied his mortal remains to the cemetery. Among those taking part in it were the persons employed by the firms of Lucca, Ricordi, Canti, Vismara; Signor Belinzaghi, the Mayor; the Professors of the Conservatory; a large number of critics, literary men, and journalists; the managers and members of the Scala, etc. The bands of the Guardia Nazionale of the city accompanied the coffin, and played a dead march, composed for the occasion by Signor Ponchielli. The speakers at the grave were Signor Mangili, a lawyer, and Signor Giuli Ricordi, the music-publisher. I will merely give the conclusion of the latter's highly characteristic speech: "If thy soul, my poor Lucca, can read, at this solemn moment, our inward thoughts, if the shudder which runs through our veins, and the painful palpitations of our hearts, are due to the secret influence of thy presence here amongst us, receive our last farewell; more than in our tears mayest thou find sweet satisfaction in the consciousness that thy name will be always cited as an instance of extraordinary virtues, and as an incitement to honest labour." Not only did Lucca do a great deal in and for Italy, but the sphere of his exertions extended far beyond the Italian peninsula (all Wagner's operas, for instance, were published and sold by him); all Germany, therefore, and more especially everyone calling himself a musician, should wish this energetic and persevering man a silent farewell from the bottom of their hearts.—Correspondent of the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

THE LATE MR. HENRY BLAGROVE.

(From the "Surrey Standard," Dec. 24th.)

Many of our readers and the musical public in this neighbourhood will learn with regret that this accomplished violinist, who, on several occasions, took a leading part in our amateur and other concerts, at the Red Lion Assembly Rooms in years past, delighting all by his exquisite playing, expired at his residence in London, on Sunday evening last, after a long and painful illness. It is only a few months since, mainly through the exertions and instrumentality of a talented brother professor, Mr. Edward Thurnam, of Reigate, that Mr. Blagrove, who was then suffering from impaired health, became the recipient of a splendid testimonial from his musical confrères throughout the country; which testimonial, amounting to upwards of £1,500, was, by the advice and wishes of his friends, chiefly invested in the purchase of a government annuity. Mr. Blagrove was not destined, however, to enjoy the fruits of this munificent offering; for although his health rallied for a time, thus encouraging a hope that his valuable life might, under Divine Providence, be spared some few years longer, he suddenly became worse about three weeks since, and died, as we have stated, on Sunday evening last, to the great regret of the musical world and many sincere and attached friends. Mr. Henry Blagrove, who had been a widower for several years, has left a son and daughter, the latter lately married. He was in his 61st year.

NOTTINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

Following the plan adopted by him last year, Mr. W. Pyatt, yesterday, presented to the inhabitants of the town and county of Nottingham and the surrounding districts one of those musical délices which demand for their adequate production resources of no ordinary kind, whether of quantity or degree. The principal feature of the entertainment of last season was the oratorio of Elì, conducted by the composer in person, Sir M. Costa, and it will be remembered by all who participated in that event that it was of a singularly interesting and distinguished character. For the occasion of yesterday, Mr. Pyatt had been fortunate enough to secure the accomplished bâton of Sir Julius Benedict to direct, in the morning, the performance of the sublime Messiah, and in the evening, a concert, comprising selections from Handel's sacred music. The appropriateness of both entertainments to the season of Christmas is obvious; and it is satisfactory to note that Mr. Pyatt's enterprise was handsomely supported by the leading families of the town and those of the neighbouring counties.

With the exception of the excisions which have now come to be regarded as requisite, Handel's great work was given in its integrity, so much so, indeed, as far as the conductor was concerned, that he played the score as marked by the composer, and without those effects of light and shade which other hands have introduced, and which are admitted to be, in their way, improvements, but which, it appears, a conscientious admirer of the great master of sacred song and subject, as Sir Julius Benedict is, cannot reconcile himself to adopt.

We are sorry to commence with a jarring observation, but the organ was in such a bad condition, so low in pitch, and so generally unfit to do the duties required of it, that it more than once nearly upset everything. What we have already intimated of Sir Julius Benedict's veneration for the maestro will be sufficient to suggest the sort of anguish the conductor would feel in having to present Handel's music with a maimed organ; and, we happen to know it was for a minute or two after the termination of the oratorio a question with him whether he should not, at the evening concert, dispense with the pandean encumbrance, altogether. But this was out of the question, as the music was again Handel's, and written for an organ above all things; so it was resolved to have an impromptu rehearsal of the evening music with a view to the best adaption that could be made of reeds and strings and brass to the ignoble array of tubes in gilt and sheen, which certainly could not on this occasion justify their bulk and prominence as a principal agent in a feast and concord of sweet sounds.

The solo artists engaged were Mdme. Patey, Miss Edith Wynne, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Signor Foli, and Mr. Henry Pyatt. The instrumentalists included the pick of the London talent, with our townsman, Mr. H. Farmer, as the leader, and Mr. G. Essex as organist; and there was a chorus of about 200, under Mr. F. M. Ward. The rendering of the oratorio was, as regards the performers, altogether satisfactory. To Mdme. Patey must be ascribed the honours of the morning, her recitatives being finely toned and impressively delivered. "He shall feed his flock," could only leave one impression, that it was an exquisite piece of music exquisitely rendered, displaying the finest qualities of Mdme. Patey's voice and style—richness, firmness, and vibrativeness of tone, with faultless management. Miss Wynne soon brought out her pure silveriness of tone, and, in, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," she sang with touching sweetness and feeling, and with a simplicity of fervour that well expressed the holy theme. Mr. Vernon Rigby was in good sound voice, and in both tone and manner suggested the idea that he at least is a tenor always to be depended upon. His declamation was firm and sound, and his execution of the airs set down for him easy and excellent, and without any flaws. Signor Foli was also in fine voice, and delivered with rich resonance of voice and well-rounded manner the recitative, "Behold, I tell you a mystery," and the pendant air, "The Trumpet shall sound," for it did sound, both through the Signor's thorax and the bright-toned instrument of the well-known Mr. Harper. Mr. H. Pyatt, too, sang remarkably well. The choruses went with remarkable steadiness, and the fugue passages were taken with most creditable alertness and accuracy. Sir Julius Benedict paid the choir a high compliment for the ability they had displayed; and it only remains to say, as a conclusion to these hasty and, probably, appropriately brief notes, that Sir Julius himself had all the honours which his presence deserved on such an occasion and from such an audience. The arrangement to follow the evening entertainment was based upon the idea that the festival should be of a Handel character throughout, and, consequently, the programme was composed of selections from Israel, Solomon, and Samson.

In conclusion we have only to add that the instrumental parts of the performances, and especially the principals, were well sustained by Mr. E. Howell (violoncello), Mr. Howell (double bass), Mr. H. Lazarus (clarionet), Mr. C. Harper (horn), Mr. Nicholson (flute), Mr. Horton (oboe), Mr. Hupins (bassoon).—(Abridged from The Nottingham Daily Press.)

THE ACOUSTICAL PROPOSITIONS OF SEDLEY TAYLOR, ESQ., M.A.

*(Late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.)

1. Sound can pass through solid, liquid, and gaseous bodies, but not through a vacuum.
2. Waves have a progressive motion, which is not that of the materials of which they, at any given instant, consist.
3. The particles, or smallest conceivable portions, of a medium which is being traversed by a wave, perform successive vibratory movements.
4. During the time occupied by any individual particle in performing one complete vibration, the system of waves advances through one whole wave-length.
5. Sound-waves are due to longitudinal vibrations of the particles of the conveying medium.
6. Each sound-wave consists of a pulse of condensation, and a pulse of rarefaction.
7. The mechanical cause of the transmission of sound-waves is the elasticity of the medium they traverse.
8. A musical sound is due to a continuous series of rapid equal vibrations.
9. Musical sounds may differ from each other in loudness, pitch, and quality.
10. Loudness depends on extent of vibration.
11. Pitch depends on rate of vibration.
12. The instrument called the syren enables us to determine the number of vibrations, per second, which correspond to a single note of assigned pitch.
13. This number is called the vibration-number of the note in question.
14. The interval between any two notes is measured by the ratio of their respective vibration-numbers.
15. When one sounding instrument causes another to give out sound, the effect is called resonance.
16. Resonance is due to the accumulated impulses of a large number of sound-waves.
17. An air cavity of given volume and form resonates most powerfully to a note of one definite degree of pitch.
18. Resonance gives us the means of singling out a note of assigned pitch from among an assemblage of notes of various degrees of pitch sounding at the same time.
19. Each sound produced by any of the musical instruments ordinarily in use is not a single musical note, but consists of a number of such notes differing from each other very considerably, both in pitch and loudness.
20. These notes are called the partial-tones of the compound sound. They form a fixed series, and their vibration-numbers, reckoned from the lowest partial-tone upwards, are proportional to the numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, &c.
21. The quality of a musical sound depends on the number, orders, and relative intensities of the partial-tones into which it is resolved by the ear.
22. Sounds of different quality may, to a certain extent, be artificially imitated by combining simple tones independently produced.
23. Two sets of equal waves, traversing a medium at the same time and in the same direction, may under certain circumstances, entirely obliterate each other.
24. An instance of this phenomenon occurs when two sounds produce silence.
25. When two simple tones, very nearly, but not quite, in unison, are sounded together, slow alternations both of loudness and of pitch succeed each other at equal intervals of time.
26. These alterations are called beats.
27. The number of beats per second is equal to the difference between the vibration-numbers of the two beating tones.
28. When beats become too rapid to be separately perceived, they produce the effect we call dissonance.
29. The dissonance arising from the beats of two simple tones is harshest when the interval between the tones is about half a note, considerably less harsh when the interval amounts to a whole note, and for intervals greater than a note and a half, imperceptible.
30. The last-mentioned interval may conveniently be called the "beating distance" for two simple tones.
31. When two composite sounds are heard at once, dissonance arises between every pair of non-coincident partial-tones which are within beating-distance of each other.
32. The whole roughness of the combination is equal to the sum of the separate dissonances thus arising.
33. Two composite sounds are said to form an absolute concord if none of their partial-tones are so situated as to produce dissonance with each other. In the opposite case, the combination is classed according to the number, intensity, and situation of the beating partial-tones, as a more or less imperfect concord, or as a discord.—(Helmholtz's Theory of Harmony.)
34. The system of "equal temperament," on which instruments with fixed sounds are now tuned, tends to efface the sharpness of definition by which, with perfect tuning, the smoother concords of the scale are separated from the neighbouring discords.
35. Vocal practice with a "tempered" instrument tends to impair purity of intonation. It would be better to have a pianoforte with one key perfectly in tune, and use this key alone in accompanying the voice for ordinary practice.

RUSKIN'S ART LECTURES.

Our Oxford correspondent writes that Mr. Ruskin recently gave the last lecture of his series this term. It was a complete thesis of his former discourses, and was principally composed of criticisms of the works of the four greatest engravers of the middle ages—Botticelli, Mantegna, Holbein, and Durer. The first two he said represented minutely and exhaustively the Southern School of Art, the latter two the Northern School. Botticelli and Holbein were two men altogether independent in their development. Trained at a period when Europe was convulsed more than she has ever been convulsed since, they were full of life, energy, passion, and they touched the two extremes. Botticelli was a man who earnestly and wholly sympathised with the Pagan and classical aspect of the Renaissance; his heart was in the Greek mythology, in the splendid Greek world, in the world of Phidias and Praxiteles. Holbein was altogether Teutonic; full of the grotesque, gloomy, coarse spun spirit which has always characterised the Northern nations. They were both utterly out of sympathy with the quackery of the time, they did not go with their age, they did what they could to reform it. They were both wholly ignorant of anatomy, and this ignorance gave them life and power and did much to idealise them. That which does much to ruin modern art is the utter lack of anything like design, and a painful accuracy in depicting familiar objects. The painter in old times was an engraver before he began to paint: hence, the predominance of design in Mediæval art. What we like are common, every-day objects, such as a cab, or a little girl in the streets; and all we want is that they should be faithfully depicted; no theory no design. Mr Ruskin then compared Gainsborough's little girl with the Sibyl of Sandro Botticelli—both great in their way; both charming. The little girl was an instance of delightful artless ignorance; the other was full of intellect and demoniacal power. Bewick, he said, was singularly accurate in his delineations of nature, but was low and too fond of objectionable objects, having a very piggish element about him; pigs haunted him; even in his Venus there was something piggish. He then went on to contrast Holbein and Botticelli at length. Holbein, he said, was a bull full of tremendous strength; Botticelli was a scholar, a gentleman, full of refinement and classicism. He spoke of the way in which Holbein's pictures were crowded with figures. If you were presented with the figure of Christ, you had to stumble up to him through vistas of amorphous creatures, deformities, men, women, and animals. Albert Durer was a man very nearly as great as Holbein, but he was ruined by his fondness for anatomy, which made his pictures disgusting, and very often utterly revolting. The result of Holbein's ignorance of anatomy was, that it made him far greater than Durer even in his representations of the human frame; it left him unfettered and mighty, and enabled him to see that what made an artist great was his power in catching the expression and life. He and Shakespeare divided their contemporary world between them. He and Botticelli have left splendid didactic pictures behind them, but Durer and Mantegna have not left one, simply because they spoiled themselves by their fondness for anatomy.

ON AN IMPROMPTU OF CHOPIN.

A mournful sound, a wail of utter woe,
Of hopeless craving for a long-sought rest;
Hurrying along, as if it, too, could know
The wish for shelter for a heart oppressed.
And then a milder strain; the soft sweet notes
Lingering, trembling, breathing purer air—
A body of sweet sound that gaily floats
High o'er the now subdued, now lost despair—
Again it comes! with milder, greater might,
With frantic haste, and spirit tempest-tossed—
As if it were a soul forever lost.

BENEDICT'S ST. PETER AT LIVERPOOL.

(Abridged from the "Liverpool Post.")

It is just two years since we noticed the first production here of St. Peter, and rather fully discanted upon the argument and actual construction of the work. Since then the composer has seen the wisdom of making several cuts and alterations which, we think, are manifestly improvements. Thus in the first chorus he has not only entirely removed some of the movements, but has re-written others, and brought into reasonable compass what had previously rather the appearance of being unnecessarily elaborated. He has also introduced a very charmingly written symphony, leading into the repeat of the original subject, "They that go down to the sea in ships," every way an improvement on the chromatic vocal writing, originally occupying this position. The processional march preceding Peter's grand song, "O, that my head were waters," has also been reduced one half, with judicious regard to effect. The tenor recitative and air, "Daughters of Jerusalem," which, though interesting in itself, always struck us as belonging rather to work specially referring to our Saviour than to St. Peter, has been excised, as also the succeeding chorus, "He is worthy to die." No. 46, a chorus for angels (two trebles and two altos), has been taken out, and completes the "cuts," unless, indeed, we include a slight alteration in the fine tenor song, "The Lord is very pitiful," by the removal of about eight bars prior to the return to the original subject. A re-hearing of the work confirms the opinion we originally expressed, viz.:—"The work is one which is immeasurably superior to any similar work produced since Elijah, containing proofs of musical genius as well as specimens of skill." There are charming melodic phrases—fresh and spontaneous—throughout, and an amount of constructive power which becomes more apparent on each re-hearing, and were it not for the exigeant character of some of the choral writing, especially as regards the compass required in each part, it would certainly be more easily rendered, and, we think, be more popular. The part of Peter must, we think, have been specially composed to suit Santley's voice, and it certainly was far more effective as he gave it last night than when we heard it first, with Stockhausen in the part. At the same time, the very fact of the baritone being exceptionally high almost turns it into a tenor in places, and puts the real tenor part at a disadvantage, a great deal of the music lying so low as to render it anything but a congenial part. With the solitary exception of the air, "The Lord is very pitiful," which is intrinsically a gem, and was given with such exquisite taste as to secure an encore, and contains almost the only G in the entire solo tenor music, Sims Reeves had really no scope. He looked very well, and received quite an ovation. The Peter of Mr. Santley was admirable throughout, and he richly deserved the encore in "Oh, that my head were waters," and the applause, as warm as it was appreciative, which greeted him through the work. Madame Patey's noble voice told to immense advantage, as on the occasion of the first production of the work. She obtained, as in 1870, an encore for the aria "O, Thou afflicted," superbly sung. Madame Florence Lancia's voice is not powerful enough for the air, "The Lord hath His way in the whirlwind." "I mourn as a dove" was better suited, and displayed her extended compass to advantage. The beauties of the quartet, "O, come let us sing unto the Lord," asserted their power, as on a previous occasion, by a hearty and merited encore, the singing being worthy of the music. Mr. Lloyd, in this and some minor tenor parts, was very effective.

The choruses were, on the whole, correct as regards the notes, prompt in taking up the leads, and generally steady. The difficult chorus, "Deep calleth unto deep," was given with correctness of intonation; and the grand chorus, concluding the first part, was also creditably sung. The double chorus in the second part was well given, and the choir in the recitative choruses displayed commendable precision. The sopranos and basses were good, the former taking their high A's and B's very creditably.

The band pleased much. The music is very rich in passages for the wind, often very catchy to play, and frequently after long waits; and we must do flutes, oboes, clarionets, and bassoons, simple justice by saying they were always there when wanted, and, though we paid very close attention, we could never detect them in error. The strings were numerically strong, if not stronger than usual. The trombones, cornets, and horns, were good. Mr. Best did all that was possible on the organ (why the committee rest content with comparatively such an apology for an organ we are at a loss to conceive). Sir Julius Benedict, who, like the principal vocalists, received a hearty recognition from audience and chorus on his appearance, conducted with untiring energy, must be congratulated on the success of his great work, and the hearty co-operation accorded to him by the executants, both vocal and instrumental. The hall was well filled, despite the dreadful weather

MUSIC IN AUSTRALIA.

(From a Correspondent.)

Lyster and Cayli's Italian and English Opera Company are just concluding a very successful season here. It is the largest company ever assembled in Sydney, embracing no less than four prime donne—Mdme. Zenoni, Madame Tamburini Coy, Signora Bosisio, and Miss Alice May; three tenors—Signor Rosnati, Signor Coy, and Mr. Armes Beaumont; two baritones—Signor Coliva and Mons. Tournerie; two basses—Signor Dondi and Mr. Rainford; besides Signora Riboldi, Madame Tournerie, Mrs. Fox, Miss Georgia Hodson, and many others. Conductors—Signor Zelman and Mr. G. B. Allen. A large répertoire of operas has been gone through, Gli Ugonotti, L'Africane, Roberto il Diavolo, Faust, Saffo, Lucrezia Borgia, Lucia, La Sonnambula, La Traviata, Il Trovatore, Norma, Ballo in Maschera, Maritana, Bohemian Girl, Satanella, Grand Duchess, Barbe Blue, Orfée aux Enfers, Rigoletto, Puritani, &c., After a grand festival, next week, in the Exhibition building, the company divides, and the Italians go to New Zealand, while the English commence a new season here, which will probably extend over Christmas. The most successful night, in point of money and numbers in the house, was the first performance of Barbe Blue, when Miss Alice May made her first appearance before a Sydney audience. In consequence of her success, it has been resolved to give an English season at the close of the present united season. Mdme. Agatha States and Signor Orlandini have just passed through Sydney on their way to California. There is to be a week's festival in Melbourne at Christmas, for which the managers are endeavouring to secure the services of Miss Alice May, Mr. Beaumont, and Mr. G. B. Allen.

MDME. LUCCA AS MRS. FORD.

Mdme. Pauline Lucca bade a temporary farewell to New York, as Mrs. Ford, in Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor, and her performance was thus noticed by the Daily Review:—

"We have now arrived at the conclusion of Mdme. Pauline Lucca's engagement, and have witnessed its supplement at the Academy of Music, and yet we feel more assured than ever that we have enjoyed only a glimpse of her versatile and apparently inexhaustible talents. Her capacity at each succeeding different representation reveals a novelty of which we had no previous conception. Her various characters are wholly distinct, and even when dramatically related are always individually separate. Her last personation was entirely diverse from all others she has pourtrayed, and yet was as perfect in outline and detail as the best of them. Her appearance on Wednesday evening, as Mrs. Ford (Frau Fluth), in Nicolai's German opera, Merry Wives of Windsor, proved a great treat to the Teutonic element present, and it abounded on this occasion. Her speaking and singing of German were grateful to the ear of every wandering native of Vaterland, for both were full of melody and expression. Mdme. Lucca throws herself heart and soul into the rôle of Mrs. Ford. She enters into the humour of it with immense relish, and depicts the character with a glowing fulness which entirely entrances the audience with its vivid and perfect counterfeit of reality. From Mrs. Ford's reading of Falstaff's letter, 'Nein, das is virklich zu keck,' till her final encounter with Sir John in Windsor Park, at whom she darts 'Mein schumcker Hirsch, bist du da?' her profound and intense appreciation of the joke is continually bubbling over and finding apt expression in her tones, looks, and action. Her simulated grief and sweeping storm of wrath, designed for her jealous husband, Mr. Ford's, benefit, are irresistibly comic. She sweeps and rages with delicious melodiousness, and keeps the house in a roar with laughter and delight. Her singing was as charming and admirable as her acting. The opening duo, the recitatives, the arias, the cabaletta, the terzetto that successfully embellish her scenes, containing many passages of simple and bright significance and others of elegant fioriture, were all given with brilliant, clear and beautiful effect. She was repeatedly summoned before the footlights, and was throughout the recipient of the heartiest testimony to the pleasure her exquisite performance afforded."

THE Cincinnati Commercial, of December 10, thus commented upon the singing of Mdlle. Liebhart at a Rubinstein Concert, given in Porkopolis:—

"Mdlle. Louise Liebhart, a pure soprano, sang the beautiful air, 'Angels ever bright and fair,' the ballad of 'Robin Adair,' and a German song, 'Ruck-Ruck,' and, in response to a call, gave 'Home, sweet home.' Her pronunciation of English is almost faultless. Her voice is clear, delicate, rather than powerful, and of considerable range. There was something in her singing of 'Robin Adair' and 'Home, sweet home' that recalled Nilsson. She belongs to the same school, and in her intonation and style there is such resemblance of method that one would conjecture they had been trained by the same master. There was genuine feeling in her interpretation of the songs, and a grace of delivery, added to sympathetic tones of her voice indescribably charming'

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1873.

THE career of M. Gounod in this country has not, up to the present time, been exactly what was anticipated when first he came among us. M. Gounod migrated hither under circumstances which disposed everyone to give him a kind reception. It might be said—nay, it has been said—that the distinguished composer left his country at a time when the paramount duty of all her sons was to stand by her with unflinching firmness. As a general proposition, this statement is undeniable; but there were circumstances in M. Gounod's case which removed it entirely out of the ordinary category. Arms and the arts have nothing in common, and when brute force comes to the front, that which is intellectual and beneficent retires. Besides, men like M. Gounod are costly stuff wherewith to stop a bullet. France could not afford to lose him, as she lost poor * * * * * * *; and the unhappy country must have felt relieved when a flight across the Channel placed her gifted son out of danger. Being here, M. Gounod found everything couleur de rose. We were all eager to give him the hand of welcome, and to pay him the honour due to a man of genius; the more so because in him was seen the victim of unhappy circumstances. Indeed, M. Gounod, like another Cæsar, came, saw, and conquered. How he was chosen to represent France at the opening of the International Exhibition in Albert Hall; elected to compose a grand Te Deum for the recovery of the Prince of Wales, and placed in the conductorial chair of the Albert Hall Society, are matters of recent history. The fitness of some of these honours was contested, it is true—but not on grounds personal to M. Gounod; and it seemed as though the French composer would take a position among us almost autocratical in dignity and power.

Very soon, however, there came a change, the best illustration of which is, that M. Gounod no longer rules in Albert Hall, but is trying, with the help of Mrs. Weldon, to drill a choir in Tavistock Square. An enquiry into the causes of this change would necessitate the handling of matters strictly personal—for which reason we cannot enter upon it here. The case, however, has one aspect open to public discussion, because it is of an essentially public nature. We refer to the frequent appearance in print of M. Gounod and those who, unhappily for him, consider themselves entitled to speak in his name. The French composer and his English allies seem to have a grave reason of offence against certain people more or less connected with music, and they lose no chance of hostile operations. When, for example, Mrs. Weldon points out an alleged error in the Musical Standard, as confirming her estimate of the knowledge of English critics; when she complains to the same paper of "impertinent criticisms," and contemptuously offers its representative a "seat at the bottom of the room" in Tavistock Square, we recognise the now familiar manœuvres of the Gounod entourage. But we unfeignedly grieve over the phenomenon, so far as the composer of Faust is concerned, because it shows undignified bitterness of feeling, and because it must bring inevitable defeat. The English public are intolerant of bores, and M. Gounod is in a fair way to be set down as the latest addition to the ranks of a questionable army.

We have made the foregoing observations in view of M. Gounod's latest escapade—a letter addressed by him to a contemporary, who announces himself as the composer's chosen medium. Here is the epistle in question:—

M. GOUNOD AND THE SUNDAY TIMES.

(To the Editor of the "Choir.")

SIR,—I have been shown a paragraph in the Sunday Times, dated as far back as 20th October. As it is a fabrication from beginning to end, I think it due to myself and Mr. and Mrs. Weldon to deny the truth of the statements therein contained, and I shall be much obliged to you to allow me to contradict them through the medium of your columns. The Sunday Times says:—"M. Gounod has offered a new three-act opera to M. Verger, manager of the Théâtre Italien, on condition that the chief part be assigned to Mrs. Weldon."

I never offered any work of mine to M. Verger; moreover, although I have not exactly refused this application, he knows from me it is very unlikely I can accede to his request that I should write an opera for his theatre. Mrs. Weldon's name was not mentioned.

Monsieur Du Locle asked me last year to write an opera on the subject of Ruth, and wished Mrs. Weldon to sing the principal part. She declined, because she had other objects in view, apart from her own career or glory, and her occupations kept her in England. Hence may come the report which the Sunday Times correspondent falsely construes into my offering a manager a work of mine under the conditions that Mrs. Weldon should be assigned the first part. The correspondent goes on to say:—"The lady has sung in Paris, and therefore M. Verger knows exactly the significance of M. Gounod's stipulation. Under these circumstances it may be that he will not close with the French composer's offer."

Mrs. Weldon did sing, and sang most successfully, in Paris, almost all the critics even being unanimous in her praise. Considering that she was an Englishwomen, and that English artists do not enjoy a high reputation on the Continent, that there were in her case, at that particular moment, especial reasons why (not unreasonably) a little hostile feeling might have been shown, it was all the more gratifying that such was not the case.

She sang at the two first concerts of the Conservatoire with great success, and M. Du Locle immediately afterwards engaged her to sing at the Opéra Comique.

The article goes on to say, "Either M. Gounod is deceived in the lady's powers, or the public have done the lady gross injustice." Even if the public had failed to recognise Mrs. Weldon's talent, which is manifestly not the case, it is not likely a man of my age and experience could be deceived in an artist's powers; and I think it will be generally admitted I am more likely to know more about art than the public. But it is not true that the public do not appreciate, and have not appreciated, Mrs. Weldon. In England it is, doubtless, the fact that most critics have managed to either run her down or suppress the fact that she has sung; moreover, I know for a fact, that when she has sung out of town people have been sent down from London to hiss her, and when she has sung in London the same thing has happened. The applause after she has sung has drowned the hisses; but I have heard them with my own ears, and know from people friendly to me that the hissers had been sent by publishers and agents in London.

As it is owing to the generous disinterestedness Mr. and Mrs. Weldon have taken in my affairs since I knew them that this persecution (if I may so call it) of Mrs. Weldon has existed, I think it my duty not any more to keep silent on the subject. The goose with the golden eggs has been squeezed too tight; and, though not so dead as the goose of the fable, I feel I am worse than that to my former traders, and that they try and revenge themselves in every possible manner, by practising malice, envy, and uncharitableness to their hearts' content. —I remain your obedient servant, CH. GOUNOD.

Tavistock House, W. C., Dec. 25th.

It is no part of our business to defend the Sunday Times against the charge of "fabrication" brought by M. Gounod; and if his letter limited itself to setting right a matter of fact, we should say nothing about it. But the reckless statements in the last two paragraphs have a wide application, and fairly come within our notice. We shall attempt no refutation, because such absurd accusations refute themselves. The idea of critics "running down" Mrs. Weldon is preposterous. Mrs. Weldon "runs down" the critics; but as it pleases her, and hurts them not, there the matter ends. As for the charges brought against M. Gounod's "former traders," M. Gounod's best friends must grieve to see him wildly flinging about statements he is wholly unable to prove. The spectacle of a man of genius thus misguided is indeed pitiful, and in result it may be disastrous. But there is yet time for repentance. Let M. Gounod use his pen only to write music, at the same time locking up the pens of his over-zealous champions, and all may yet go well.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

WE take the following short and suggestive paragraph from the Birmingham Morning News of Friday, December 27th:—

"FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY'S CONCERT.—We understand that the Birmingham Festival Choral Society gave a performance of the Messiah, at the Town Hall, last night. Reporters' tickets were refused us unless we would promise a favourable report."

If this be true, comment is unnecessary; if this be not true (mark the distinction) comment is unnecessary. In either case (on third thoughts) comment would, even at first sight, be unnecessary. A. S. S.

AT the reception of the Japanese ambassadors by M. Thiers on Friday, the principal person among them read a little speech in the Japanese language, which he delivered in a sort of accented rhythm resembling a song. This mode of speaking is adopted in Japan as an expression of respect, and as a mark of the greatest politeness. The idea is by no means a bad one, and must have been suggested by some Japanese Machiavelli. How advantageous to a public man would be the power of concealing embarrassment or emotion under a monotone! How impossible it would be to utter personalities or to make foolish after-dinner speeches in tones fixed by a tuning-fork. Orators interrupting each other, or addressing the audience simultaneously, should, on this principle, be permitted to do so on condition of supplying the full chord suggested by the note of the first speaker, and harmony would at least be produced in one sense. A stormy meeting would in that case resolve itself into the performance of a concerted piece of truly Wagnerian complexity.

Shaver Gilbert.

M. ALEXANDRE DUMAS has exacted from Germany an instalment of his country's revanche. Having been offered certain terms for the right of representing La Femme de Claude at Berlin, M. Dumas thus replied to the offerer, Herr Steinitz:—

"Sir,—I have just received your letter of the 12th December, 1872, in which you tender me 8,000 francs for the use of my new piece in Prussia. The terms do not satisfy me: I want Alsace. Receive, &c., A. DUMAS."

Our Teutonic friends should be shy of opening "doors of utterance" to their quick-witted enemies.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Mendelssohn's Elijah will be performed at the Society's next Subscription Concert, on Friday, 10th inst. Mr. Santley will sustain the part of the Prophet, Mdme. Sherrington, Mrs. S. Smith, Mdme. Patey, Mrs. Osborne Williams, and Mr. Vernon Rigby, being the other principal vocalists. The performance will be under Sir Michael Costa's direction.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Miss Jessie Morison, a young pianist who cannot yet have seen fourteen summers, gave a pianoforte "recital" on Saturday, the 28th Dec., by kind permission, at the residence of Miss Temple, Upper Bedford Place. The young artist (we call her artist advisedly) has been studying with Mr. W. H. Holmes, and proved herself, on the occasion of her début, a worthy pupil of so eminent a master. When we state that the following pieces were played by Miss Morison, without book, and in a way that few practised pianists could surpass, we have said enough to show that the young débutante is gifted with more than ordinary musical talent:—Concerto for pianoforte (with accompaniment for second pianoforte, Mr. W. H. Holmes), W. G. Cusins; Studies, Allegro con precisione, Moderato grazioso, Allegro brillante, Vivace giocoso, Andante capriccioso, and an Allegro agitato, Sir Sterndale Bennett: Allegro, Handel; Fugue, W. F. Bach; Grand March, from Wagner's Tannhäuser, Franz Liszt; Waltz, in E flat, Chopin; and Erin, Sir Julius Benedict. Besides these pieces Miss Morison played, with the composer (Mr. T. M. Mudie), a charming duet, entitled "Oriana," which was admired and applauded, as the high merits of the composition and its capital performance deserved. The "recital" was varied with some agreeable singing by Mrs. Watts Hughes and Mr Frank Holmes, as well as some excellent harp performances by Mr. John Thomas (harpist to Her Majesty), who was also assisted in his clever duet for two harps, entitled "Scenes of childhood," by Mrs. J. B. Chatterton. It is announced that Miss Jessie Morison will play, at her next "recital," selections from the works of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c.

LOWER NORWOOD.—The Messiah was performed at the Lower Norwood Institute, by Mr. George Tolhurst's Choir, on Monday evening. The vocalists were Misses Kate Worth, Jeanie Brown, Tasker, and Robbins; Messrs. Shimmell, John Davis, and Copping.

Thy tongue
Makes Welsh as sweet as ditties highly penn'd,
Sung by a fair queen in a summer's bower,
With ravishing division to her lute.
Shakespeare.

To Miss Edith Wynne.

THE Boston Lyceum gave a concert on the 30th of October, when Madame Rudersdorff's new company made their first appearance in Boston. Miss Alice Fairman made a pleasant impression, and so did Miss Liebe, the violinist.

PROVINCIAL.

WARRINGTON.—The Musical Society's second concert took place in the Public Hall, before a moderately good attendance. The vocalists were Miss Catherine Poyntz, Madame Poole, Mr. H. Pearson, Mr. Robert Hilton, and the Society's Choir of ninety voices. Mr. Pattison presided at the organ, and Dr. Hiles conducted. Miss Poyntz sang a Scotch ballad, "When ye gang awa', Jamie" (encored). Mr. R. Hilton, one of the favourites of the evening, was recalled after each appearance. His voice, in "The Wolf" (encored), told with effect. In reply to a demand for the repetition of Louis Diehl's popular song, "The Mariner," he substituted "The Pilot." Mr. Pearson sang Balfe's ballad, "In this old chair," effectively. Madame Poole sang "The Unwise Choice." The choir was encored after Pinsuti's part song, "In this hour."

BRISTOL.—The Messiah was given to a large audience at the Colston Hall on "Boxing Night," with Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. Brandon, and Mr. Wilford Morgan, as solo vocalists; Mr. Riseley as organist, and Mr. Greenwood as conductor. The oratorio was listened to with wrapt attention. "Madame Sherrington's most successful airs"—writes the Bristol Times—"were 'Rejoice greatly' and 'I know that my Redeemer liveth.' Miss Julia Elton sang with her accustomed care and expression. Her best achievement was 'He was despised and rejected.' It was applauded to the echo. 'He shall feed his flock,' too, was exquisitely sung. Mr. Brandon gave 'The trumpet shall sound,' with effect, and Mr. Morgan met with a hearty reception; but, was suffering from a cold, which hardly allowed him to do justice to himself. Most of the choruses were carefully and steadily given, and the 'Hallelujah Chorus' and 'Worthy is the Lamb' were particularly well done."

"The following interesting remarks"—says a local paper—"were made by Mr. Richards on the origin of the following melodies:—'The ash grove'—Mr. Chappell doubts the antiquity of this air in his remarks on 'Cease your funning,' because he does not find it in certain early editions of music. The air is said to belong either to the county of Carmarthen or Glamorgan. Among other titles given to it was 'Llewellyn,' in a ballad on that prince. Whether 'Cease your funning' was borrowed from 'Llyn on' or not, we know that it was brought to London by John Gray, from his native place in North Devon, which was frequently visited by Welsh harpers. The melody is a genuine specimen of Welsh music, of which many similar forms are to be found in our national airs. The peasantry, so I am informed, in that part of the county of North Devon, often sing snatches of 'Llyn on,' or 'The ash grove,' but know nothing of it by the English title, 'Cease your funning.' The air was made popular in England by its introduction in the Beggar's Opera, in 1728. 'Ye banks and braes'—Mr. Chappell (in 'Music of the olden time') has not limited his doubts about the origin of certain airs to Wales, for he tells us that 'Ye banks and braes' is not Scottish. Burns thought that the tune was Scotch, and wrote the words by which the melody is known, i.e. 'Ye banks and braes,' but he gives the original version. He says it is an English song, 'Lost, lost, lost is my quiet,' and he adds that it was published long before the Scotch tune. The American national air, 'Yankee doodle,' was composed by an Englishman, fife-major in the Grenadier Guards, about the middle of the 18th century, and when the English troops under Lord Cornwallis were defeated, the Yankees struck up the tune as a taunt of victory. Words were set to it, and it has ever since become the American national air."

CORK.—Weber's Mass was sung at SS. Peter and Paul's on Christmas Day, under the leadership of Mr. Nagle. Miss Blake sang the Mass with the two Mrs. Perry's and Miss Hegarty, Mr, Coakley, and Mr. M'Carthy. Mrs. Adolph and Miss Kate Fitzpatrick sang the "Ave Maria," after the Elevation. Mr. Sexton's voice was listened to with attention during his two solos. Miss Fitzpatrick played the Mass; she contributed immensely to the success of a deeply solemn, impressive, and beautiful ceremony, well calculated to elevate our better feelings.

DUBLIN.—The Irish Times of Dec. 27 says that:—

"Offenbach's Les Brigands has been successfully brought out at the Gaiety, and that the characters of Falsacappa, the brigand chief (Mr. E. D. Beverley), the Duke of Mantua (Mr. Laurent), the Princess of Grenada (Mdlle. Albertazzi), were delineated with that style of finish so eminently characteristic of the artists of the London Gaiety Opera-Bouffé Company. Mdlle. Emile Georgi, as Fragoletto, a young farmer, contributed largely to the enjoyment of the performance by her magnificent voice, and she creditably sustained a most difficult and trying part. From the reception accorded to it last night, The Brigands will enjoy a long and prosperous run."

LIVERPOOL.—The Porcupine speaks as follows of a concert given by the "Societa Armonica":—

"A very admirable performance of Handel's Messiah was given by the society on Saturday last, in the Lecture Room of the Institute, in Mount Street. There were many deficiencies, but still, the principal portion of the work was done, both by band and chorus, with accuracy and spirit; and Mr. Armstrong, the conductor, deserves credit for his skill in wielding the bâton, and for the well-drilled condition of his forces. Most of the leads were taken up with clearness and precision by the chorus, and the chief defect seemed to be a want of power on the part of the tenors and trebles. There were some very good pianos produced by the choristers and the orchestra, but the fortes, especially where all the brass instruments came in, were too loud and turbulent. The soli parts were committed to the charge of an admirable quartet of local singers. Miss Moukhouse sang and declaimed her passages with great spirit and effect. This lady has a clear, fresh, and brilliant soprano voice of considerable compass. Miss Clara Nicholls was required, at a very short notice, to undertake the alto part. She acquitted herself with her usual efficiency, although a slight nervousness marred the effect of her opening solo. It was, however, speedily overcome, and her deep rich voice was afterwards heard to the best advantage. Mr. J. Busfield gave the tenor solos with great taste, feeling and delicacy. His performance evinced careful training and a conscientious study of the best models. The bass solos were entrusted to Mr. F. J. Cutts, who rendered them with accuracy and spirit. This gentleman has a full, resonant bass voice, well adapted to the execution of oratorio music. Considering the merits and claims of the Societa Armonica, and the fact that this concert was given for their own benefit, we were surprised and disappointed to see such a thin attendance. The injurious neglect which merely local efforts meet with in Liverpool, is one of the greatest obstacles to the advancement of music amongst us, and a slur upon the spirit and taste of the community."

PLYMOUTH.—We take the following from a local paper:—

"The philosophers who speculate as to which was first, the hen or the egg, would oblige by a solution of the cognate problem, whether The Messiah was made for Christmastide, or Christmas was devised as an occasion on which the Messiah should be annually presented. Leaving others to pursue this theme, we record with pleasure that a very large audience assembled last evening at the Albert Hall to listen to a performance of Handel's greatest oratorio by the Plymouth Vocal Association, under the admirable conductorship of Mr. Löhr. The rendering of the music was worthy of the work, and, as a whole, was by far the most finished performance on which the society ever had to congratulate itself. Of the singing of the choruses it is as little needful to speak critically as it is to describe the music. The singing was as near perfection as one can hope to attain with amateurs. The Sacred Harmonic Society may have better musicians in its choir, but it could not render the Messiah choruses with greater precision, and (which especially marked last night) with a more careful and tasteful observance of light and shade; to add greater numbers would have been to overpower the hall. The band did its work most efficiently. A few additional instruments, however, would have enabled some telling orchestral effects to be introduced. Of the vocalists, it is only necessary to say that they fully sustained the reputations they have previously won in Plymouth."

HASTINGS.—The first and second of a series of six concerts, to be given by M. Cavalerio and Mr. Lade, have been given with success. The artists engaged were Miss Fanny Heywood, Miss Estelle Emerick, Signor Rizzelli, Signor Caravoglia (from the Royal Italian Opera), Le Chevalier de Kontski, Mr. Carrodus, Mr. Vivian, Mr. Richardson, and Mr. Kelly. At both the morning and evening concert Miss Heywood was received with great favour, encored in "The last rose of summer," and enthusiastically recalled, with Signor Caravoglia, in a duet from Il Barbiere di Siviglia. Miss Emerick sang "Ah s'estinto" and "My lady sleeps." Signor Rizzelli was encored in "M'appari tutt' amor" and "A si ben mio." Signor Caravoglia made quite a hit with the audience by his spirited singing, and obtained hearty recalls after his buffo songs from Figaro, and a duet with Signor Rizzelli. Messrs. Vivian and Richardson were called upon to repeat their solos on the flute and clarionet, and Mons. de Kontski received encores for his fantasia on Faust and his "Reveil du Lion."

STANLEY'S lecture season closed suddenly, and unsatisfactorily, after the second of the series. Whether there remains any latent doubt in the minds of the public as to the verity of his achievements or not, some untoward occasion induced a non-appearance at his entertainment, which was calculated not only to injure the pockets, but the prestige, of his manager, so he was wisely withdrawn to seek for better success elsewhere, the which we wish him with all our hearts.—Fifth Avenue Journal.

"STRING OR STRINGED."

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—I have observed, not without pain, that many excellent critics, yourself among the number, call the various instruments of the violin family "string instruments," as though they were not merely fitted with strings, but actually made of string—even as "brass instruments," correctly so called, are made of brass. I do not object to neologisms under all circumstances. If, for instance, it had been customary until within the last dozen years or so to call a violin a "string instrument," I should have thought it a happy innovation to substitute for "string," "stringed." But as violins were always, until quite lately, called "stringed instruments;" as almost everyone calls them "stringed instruments" now (you yourself doubtless do so in ordinary conversation); as, moreover, they are "stringed," and not "string," I venture to suggest that you should restore to them their ancient, ordinary, and correct name. Call a rope-ladder or a hempen noose a "string instrument," if you please, but not a violin.—Yours admiringly,

THOMAS DIAFOIRUS.

[In a musical sense it would scarcely be advisable to call a rope-ladder, or even a hempen noose, "string instrument." The latter one—mysteriously foreshadowing the destiny of our correspondent, "Thomas &c.,"—might perhaps be called a "swing" instrument; for what can be thought of a man who does not object to neologisms under all circumstances, and who unblushingly avows it?—A. S. S.]

ITALIAN OPERA IN BIRMINGHAM.

The following correspondence has appeared in the Birmingham Daily Post:—

(To the Editor of the "Daily Post.")

SIR.—From a source which I fear is but too reliable, I regret to learn that it is not Mr. Mapleson's intention to revisit Birmingham with his operatic company, the patronage accorded on this occasion, although better than on the last, still leaving him a considerable loser by the enterprise. True, the Wednesday evening showed a full house, but this would not compensate for the shortcomings of the previous nights; and, as a whole, the speculation has not been attended with the success it deserved. That a town, which so justly prides itself upon the honour of having produced the greatest musical masterpiece of modern, if not of any time—I need hardly say that I allude to Mendelssohn's Elijah—and which, moreover, has earned a reputation for giving the finest Festival performances in Europe—should show itself less appreciative than Edinburgh, Glasgow, Liverpool, Manchester, and many other places, where the same company has recently played to houses literally crammed in every part, seems incredible; and although its comparative proximity to the metropolis may perhaps be adduced as a reason to some extent, I cannot think that this is the whole explanation of a fact which would seem to cast doubt upon the pretensions of Birmingham to be considered a really musical town.—I am, sir, yours, &c., A THIRTY YEARS OPERA-GOER.

SIR,—By a fortunate accident I have seen the letter signed "A Thirty Years Opera-goer," which appeared in your valuable journal of the 12th inst. Although the circumstances of the somewhat small attendance in the pit and gallery, on the occasion of the operatic performances which I gave recently in Birmingham, justify the assumption of your correspondent, still you will, I feel sure, allow me to say that at the present time I have not determined to discontinue my performances in Birmingham. When I visited Birmingham with my opera company some twelve years ago I was so disappointed with the limited interest displayed that I allowed an interval of nine years to elapse before I returned to your town. In November, 1869, however, I gave three performances, and the support accorded then justified me in giving in November, 1870, six representations of Italian Opera. But on this occasion I became painfully aware that the interest shown in 1869 was sensibly diminished. Since 1870 I have given operatic performances in your town, and I am pleased to be able to say that, in spite of the support not being what one might reasonably expect from the enlightened population of so important a borough as Birmingham, it evinced signs of increase, rather than decrease, and that the losses have sensibly diminished on each visit.

On the last occasion which furnished "A Thirty Years Opera-goer" with the opportunity of making public the unfortunately true state of the case, I should remark that, whereas the superior parts of the house were fairly well and fashionably filled, the pit and gallery, although the prices had been considerably reduced, were almost empty. Am I right in assuming that the visitors, or rather the expected visitors, to those portions of the auditorium are surfeited with operatic music, and that they are in the habit of paying flying visits to the metropolis to hear Italian opera there? It was whispered to me that their musical appreciation is limited, and that the humorous, but scarcely classical or elevating songs of "the Great Vance" aroused their sympathies more than Mozart did. I cannot believe this. I have entire confidence in the oft-made assertion that Birmingham is as musical a town as Liverpool, Manchester, Bristol, &c., &c., where liberal patronage is accorded to the ennobling and beautiful art, of which I hope I may class myself as a promoter.—I am, sir, your obedient servant, J. H. MAPLESON.

ORGAN OPENING AT METHLEY.

During the past summer a bazaar was held at Methley, the object being to raise funds for a suitable organ for the venerable parish church. The opening of the organ took place recently, Dr. Spark, organist of the Town Hall, Leeds, presiding at the instrument, which had been obtained at the establishment of Messrs. Gray and Davison, of London.

The instrument consists of two complete manuals from CC to G, the swell organ going throughout pedals from CCC to E, two octaves and a third. The following are the stops:—

GREAT ORGAN.

Great Manual to Pedals.

There are five composition pedals—three to the great organ, and two to the swell for changing—the stops in the combinations most required by the organist. The front is very handsomely decorated in gold and colour.

A local journal has the following remarks:—

"In the construction of the instrument, the very best materials—wood and metal—have been used, and with most satisfactory results. The tone of all the stops, especially the reeds, is pure, equal, and brilliant; the contrast between the softer and more powerful registers giving evidence of great skill. A special service was held at three o'clock. The Processional Hymn, to the tune of 'St. Michaels,' was sung by clergy and choristers (nearly fifty in number). The service was full choral throughout. The Rev. J. Harper, of Holbeck, intoned; the lesson appointed was the 150th Psalm, and was read by the rector, the Hon. and Rev. Philip Yorke Savile. The usual Methley Church Choir was strengthened by choristers from the Parish Church and St. George's, Leeds, directed by Mr. Young, of Wakefield. The sermon was preached by the Rev H. Temple, of Leeds. The anthems were, the first, by Dr. Wesley, 'Blessed be the God and Father,' the solo being well sung by Master Waring; and the second, by Dr. Spark, Balaam's prophecy, 'I shall see him, but not now;' both of which, especially the latter, were most effectively given. In the course of the service, Dr. Spark played two voluntaries, one of his own, on the subject of 'Jerusalem, the golden,' and the other from Handel's 'Messiah;' both fully displaying the varied effects of the instrument."

Lines for Music.

THE FOLLOW-ME-LAD.

As she hurried along, from square to square,
The curb smiled bright, and the bricks grew glad;
For her step was soft and her face was fair,
And behind her floated a Follow-me-lad.

I know not how she was dressed, nor care;
I only know, had a fairy bade
Me name one wish, why, then and there,
I'd have wished to be changed to her Follow-me-lad.

Only a ribbon around a neck,
Only a ribbon, plain or plaid;
Only a look, saying; "Come at my beck;"
Only, only a Follow-me-lad!

Only a life hanging 'round that neck,
Only a life to make happy or sad;
Only a fate to prosper or wreck;
Only, only a Follow-me-lad!

MARIE MALIBRAN.*

No woman has ever been, in the course of her career, surrounded by more universal homage, or crowned with a more brilliant halo of glory. Marie Malibran occupied for herself alone more space in the periodical press than did all the queens of her time put together; she inspired more poets than all the beauties of the Middle Ages; and obtained more triumphs than all the artists of the present day. Her admirers unharnessed the horses from her carriage to drag her themselves in triumph; they rendered military honours to her as to kings, and they raised a theatre called by her name, a sort of temple in which to perform her apotheosis; but the world, which, constantly guilty of the same mistake, will persist in believing that there is always something mysterious and strange about persons of genius, welcomed, eagerly and in good faith, stories concerning the most innocent details of her private life; made her out so eccentric and fabulous a personage, and placed her in so exceptional a sphere of poetry, that the poor artist laughed at it herself, frequently with her frank, childlike laugh, but sometimes also with sadness. Marie Malibran—and we appeal for corroboration to all who enjoyed the good fortune of being intimately acquainted with her—was great, because she was simple, truthful and ingenuous; yet sometimes she must have appeared guilty of dissimulation.

In the present state of society, where everything is inside out, this was necessarily so; at first sight, any one would have thought her cold and disdainful, but this severity of demeanour was the result of natural timidity, which, despite her utmost efforts, she could never overcome. In society, Marie Malibran was seriously embarrassed, not because she was ignorant of its ways, for she rendered all characters with prodigious facility, but because, naturally inclined to frankness and confidence, she felt completely happy nowhere but in the narrow and familiar circle of her friends. Habituated from infancy to submission and fear, she mistrusted every new face, fancying that every one who was introduced to her, came to look at her as a curiosity; then she would cast down her eyes, quite confused, and as though ashamed of her glory.

Her early years were unhappy; her father, Garcia, soon perceived her marvellous natural talent for music, and looked upon her as the instrument of his fortune, the continuation of his reputation, and the amusement of his leisure hours. The consequence was that not a single caress ever found a place in his efforts to teach her singing. He liked her as he liked his piano. When he had given his lesson, he left her alone, the whole evening, without a light, while he was at the theatre. Marie, a little thing of five or six, summoned the neighbours with her tears, and when, from the sound of footsteps, she was sure that some one was coming, she suddenly became quiet, explaining, very calmly, that, on being left alone, she had been seized with fear; she would then gently beg her visitors to tell her stories till her father returned. The plan proved so successful that, during her long evenings, she never was without stories or company. At length, at the very moment her heart was flattered with the hope that her years of trial and sufferings were on the point of being exchanged for days of happiness, Garcia (under the circumstances, we have not the courage to give him the name of father), sacrificed her to a man who returned with ingratitude the most heroic self-devotion, and filled a peaceful existence with gall and sorrow, till the day when the tribunals forcibly undid a knot contrary to all the laws of society and of affection. But the misfortune which the illustrious actress found it most difficult to bear, was the fact of her being condemned, without any one on earth having the power of helping her, to bear the name of Malibran for the whole of her life. This name poisoned all her triumphs, and caused her to curse her celebrity.

However, despite everything the wickedness of man had done against her, instead of becoming misanthropical, she was good and sympathizing, and that, too, without ambition or display. Scattering her benefits, through the hands of her friends, on all whose necessities she succeeded in divining, her first stipulation was that she should remain unknown. She was amiable and gracious with her comrades at the theatre, no matter what might be their rank, and she did what she could to fill up the distance between them. It was not merely in words, but in deeds, also, that she treated them as though they and she had been members of the same family. A poor dancer, named Durante, had died, behind the scenes at the San Carlo, in an apoplectic fit, leaving his wife and children in the most frightful destitution. After promising the widow to sing at her benefit, Madame Malibran taxed her friends, according to their respective fortunes, and, on this occasion only, proud of the favour she enjoyed at Court, appeared before the King of Naples. "Sire," she said, "I am getting up a subscription for the family of my unfortunate comrade, Durante. The Queen and the Prince of Salerno have given me five hundred francs each; I hope your Majesty will not be less generous than your august relatives."—"How much do you require me to give?" replied the King, smiling.—"A thousand francs."—"There they are."

Three days afterwards, her carriage was upset, and she dislocated her arm. In consequence of this accident, the theatre was closed, and the closing of the San Carlo, during the Carnival season, is considered one of the very greatest public calamities. Every day, a crowd of poor wretches, whose only means of subsistance had been suddenly cut off, flocked to Madame Malibran's door, to inquire how she was getting on. Their discouragement was, therefore, profound, when they heard the doctor had given strict orders that she should keep her bed for three months. But Madame Malibran, heedless of all kinds of remonstrances, was playing within the week in the Somnambula, at the Fondo, with her arm in a sling. This was the only thing with which the indefatigable virtuosa might have been reproached by her friends. Relying on her exceedingly strong constitution, she worked day and night, without rest, without respite, and without sparing herself. This was the real irregularity of her life. The love of art, that invincible passion which has destroyed so many great artists, killed her in her youth. Very often, after having sung in Otello or La Gazza, her nerves remained in a state of tension, like a string that keeps on vibrating. It was a necessity for Malibran to sing up to two o'clock in the morning. On such occasions her voice was angelic in its expression, and her eyes shone like fire; her singing was alternately melancholy and wildly excited, till she fell exhausted and nearly fainting on her bed. To counteract this state of extreme moral tension she required movement, amusement, and physical exertion. She walked till she was utterly knocked up with fatigue; she designed her costumes; cut out her dresses; put on her things, and dressed her hair, without ever having recourse to a maid. With all this, she was as docile and submissive as a child to the advice of her friends. One evening, after she had sung, the entire audience rose as one man, at the final air. The excitement was so great that, entertaining serious apprehensions that the enthusiasts would jump over the footlights, she ran away. A few minutes afterwards we were in her room congratulating her, and thanking her for the happiness she had procured us. De Beriot was not in the theatre. "For pity's sake," she observed, "do not say a word to De Beriot! He would scold me, for I sang an unhappy note which he has very justly forbidden me to sing, as it might ruin my voice."

With the exception of music, of which she possessed the knowledge of a professor, Madame Malibran never learned anything, and she yet could do anything. As for history, she divined it; it was sufficient to tell her the beginning of an event; she would go on with the continuation and the end, scarcely ever making a mistake. Instinctive knowledge of the human heart enabled her to find the thread in the labyrinth of the passions. She spoke English, French, Spanish, and Italian, perfectly, singing and composing in the four languages. But her own peculiar language was not one of those I have just mentioned. She formed for her own use among her friends an imitative idiom, which possessed for them an indescribable charm. When she related anything that had happened to her, she mimicked, naturally and unconsciously, in the vivacity of her conversation, the voice and tone of the persons of whom she was speaking; if the name of any bird escaped her, she imitated its notes. You fancied you yourself were present at the scene at which she had been present; her language was almost visible and palpable. On one occasion, she thought she would try her hand at Italian poetry. She showed me some charming designs, and some undoubtedly bad verses; I frankly advised her to keep to painting. "I am sorry for that," she replied, laughing; "I should have liked to prove my gratitude to poetry, for poets have always treated me well, while painters have made me ten times more ugly than I am."

From that time she gave up poetry, but, in her leisure hours, went on with her sketches, the last of which she gave Lablache, the day before her fatal illness. She was gay, contented, and happy that day. On entering church, however, her eyelids were moistened with tears at the sound of the organ. Alas! she had no presentiment she was going to die. In the evening, she sang with Lablache, the duet of the Prova, and, with Mdme. Caradori, a duet of Mercadante's. Her singing was superhuman. It was her farewell to life.

A FRIEND.

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co.

Do not wound the heart that loves thee. Song. Words by DEXTER SMITH; Music by Sir JULIUS BENEDICT.

Sir Julius Benedict has aforetime been indebted to the Transatlantic poet, Mr. Dexter Smith, for some capital words; and he is now under additional obligation. The moral of the verses before us is unexceptionable, and the verses themselves are well put together. As for the music, it will suffice to say that Sir Julius here shows not only the qualities of a composer who cannot write otherwise than as an accomplished master of his art, but also a keen sympathy with the subject, and a subtle power of expression. The passages of mark in the song are too numerous for citation. Enough that in its union of high art with deep feeling may be found the essentials of true popularity. Key, D major, with an episode in B flat; voice—mezzo-soprano or baritone.

MORLEY & Co.

Keepsakes. Song. Written and composed by JANET MACDONALD.

A vein of melancholy runs through this song, but it is the tender melancholy—a "sweet sorrow"—called up by pleasant memories of the past. Miss MacDonald has allied to her good verses music of a simple but appropriate character,—such music as most aids the expression of feeling, by giving the performer full scope. Amateurs in want of an easy song, which will alike suit them and their audience, may find it here.

The man whom Dr. Chalmers engaged to manage a disorderly Sunday School kept his eyes wide open while praying, and when one boy thrust a pin into another he marched up the aisle, still praying, and cuffed that boy's ears, and went back again, praying all the way. After that, he was master of the situation, for the boys thought that a man who could watch and pray like that was not to be put down.

The Daily Telegraph, of Thursday week, thus noticed a song by Miss Francesca Ferrari, which has already been commented upon in our columns:—

"Francesca Ferrari has given us a very well written and effective setting of Uhland's 'Die Kapelle,' with both German and English words. The episode in A flat is specially worthy of praise, and the entire song encourages a hope that its accomplished young authoress will eventually take a high position in the ranks of native composers."

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The succession of Mr. C. E. Willing to Mr. Coward, as organist of the Sacred Harmonic Society, owing to the failing health of the latter gentleman, although not publicly announced by the committee, is, we believe, virtually decided upon, and the well-known organist of the Foundling may therefore be congratulated on having been appointed to one of the most honourable positions in the profession. Mr. Willing, it will be remembered, was for some years organist of the church of All Saints, Margaret Street, and is at present superintending choirmaster of the St. Alban's Choral Union.

A bit of romance has just come to light, and of the good old-fashioned kind. The heroine is a very worthy young lady, Miss Matilda Phillipps, sister of Adelaide, who has been, for some time, studying the art divine in Italy. The old adage, "A faint heart ne'er won fair lady," has been for once reversed, and just in this way. By some means or other, a young man fell into the water at Genoa, and would have been drowned, beyond all doubt, had he not been rescued by Miss Phillipps. It was a very brave deed on her part, but a good one. The best of the whole affair lies in the following crisp words, which she sent to her sister: "We are very great friends ever since, and he can scarcely do enough for me. I have had beautiful letters from his mother and sisters, and I feel so happy to have done anything to bring so much happiness to any one." The name of the youth she familiarly terms "Walter." Now you know how the story will end, as well as we!—Watson's Art Journal.

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May! What joys attend thine advent gay!

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May!
What joys attend thine advent gay!
On every tree the birdies sing,
From hill and dale glad echoes ring;
The lark, inspir'd, to Heav'n ascends,
The gurgling brook in beauty wends
By mossy bank and grassy brae,
Where violets bloom and lambkins play.
Delightful Spring—sweet month of May
What joys attend thine advent gay!

In mantle clad of fairest sheen,
The woods burst forth in virgin green—
Bright home of birds and flow'rets gay,
The streamlet wooes thy sheltered way,
Thro' primrose dells, sweet hawthorn glades,
And silver birches' fragrant shades,
Where nightingales, at close of day,
In leafy bow'rs trill raptur'd lay.
Delightful Spring—sweet month of May
What joys attend thine advent gay!

PREFACE.

No country possesses more good voices than England, and many voices would be a fortune to their owners if they knew how to use them.

Vocal Exercises, however, are much neglected, owing, in a great measure, to their monotony of passage and of style.

The object of these Studies is to make practice as attractive as possible, and the Waltz form has therefore been chosen for its liveliness.

A selection has been made of passages best suited to give flexibility to the voice, and the six Waltzes here presented contain the germs of a thorough method of vocal practice.

The Italian language is preferred on account of the openness of the vowels; but these studies can be used advantageously without words, by simply "vocalising" on the vowel A (pronounced in Italian, Ah.)

Commas (,) are placed where breath is to be taken. At first, however, pupils should practise each study very slowly, and draw breath whenever found necessary.

WALTER MAYNARD'S
SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION.

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hand facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country. The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

A PRIZE OF FIVE GUINEAS

FOR A FOUR-PART GLEE, OR CATCH.

REGULATIONS.

1. Each Competitor to send to the Secretary of the Club, on or before the 17th of March next, 1873, Two Scores of the Glee (clearly copied), and a copy of the words to print from.
2. Each Composition to be marked with a Motto—the same Motto to be on the copy of words, the Scores, and upon a sealed Envelope containing the Composer's name and address.
3. Manuscripts sent to the Secretary not to be in the Composer's hand writing.
4. Any Competitor, directly or indirectly canvassing the members so as to influence their decision, will be disqualified from gaining the prize.
5. The successful Glees to become the property of the Club.
6. No Competitor shall be awarded more than one of the above Prizes; but, should the Committee consider a Second Competition of sufficient merit, they shall have the option of purchasing it for the Club.

The Glees to be performed at a meeting of the Club as early as possible in the season, and the Members then present will decide, by Ballot, which of the Compositions shall have the Prize. After the decision, the Envelopes belonging to the successful Glees will be opened, and the Composer's name declared. All the other Envelopes will be destroyed unopened, and the Honorary Secretary will be requested not to disclose the names of such unsuccessful Competitors as may apply to him for their manuscripts.

By Order,
HENRY BUSSELL, Hon. Secretary.

"ST. PATRICK AT TARA."
CANTATA.
By PROFESSOR GLOVER.
Dedicated by permission to
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ARTHUR PATRICK.
Price 3s.; bound in cloth, gilt, 5s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"The publication of Professor Glover's Cantata, 'St. Patrick at Tara,' will be gladly welcomed by choral societies, requiring a work of moderate difficulty but extensive interest. The subject, essentially national in character, is, moreover, one that could scarcely fail to awaken the attention of most people, but more especially Irishmen, who will doubtless see that the spirit of the ancient bards has not entirely passed away from the more prosaic times. For freedom of melodic treatment and characteristic harmony Mr. Glover's Cantata deserves to be widely known. There is a special interest attached to the work, inasmuch as H.R.H. Prince Arthur Patrick has been pleased to accept the dedication of a theme which treats of a period of everliving interest."—Morning Post.

"This cantata, it may be remembered, was performed at St. George's Hall last year, and was remarkably well received. It has now been published in a convenient and elegant volume, uniform with Professor Glover's edition of Moore's "Irish Melodies." The theme of the cantata is the introduction of Christianity into Ireland, and the poetical selections set to music are taken from the works of Ossian, Moore, Clarence Mangan, and other poets. The peculiar and distinguishing characteristics of the composition consist in the intermingling of music of a national with music of a sacred description, which produces a striking and not unpleasing effect. There are several pretty melodies in this cantata, among which a contralto solo, "I often wish," and a bass song, "Lord have mercy upon me," stand out conspicuously. As the execution of "St. Patrick at Tara" does not present any formidable difficulties, we should say it is likely to become a favourite with amateur choral societies, as well as with their audiences."—The Echo.

"SWEETHEART WALTZ."
FOR THE PIANOFORTE,
On the popular song, "My Sweetheart when a Boy," (beautifully Illustrated.)
Price 4s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street.

THIS New and Charming Waltz will be played at the ADELPHI THEATRE, nightly, under the direction of Mr. Edwin Ellis.
At the Spa Concerts, SCARBOROUGH, under the direction of Herr Meyer Lutz.
At the Royal STRAND THEATRE, under the direction of Mr. John Fitzgerald.
At the Royal Assembly Rooms, MARGATE, under the direction of Mr. Spillane.

"Mr. Wilford Morgan is to be congratulated. Singer, actor, and composer, equally pleasure-giving in each capacity; but, for choice, most admirable as composer. His song, 'My Sweetheart when a boy,' is one of the most popular of its time; and upon the song he has founded the 'Sweetheart Waltz.' If English composers and publishers would give us more such there would be less scope for going into ecstasies over the German school of dance composition. The leading theme is charmingly fresh and tuneful in its waltz tempo; and the subordinate subjects—if they may be called subordinate—are equally piquant and graceful. The 'Sweetheart' will be as popular in the ball room as 'My Sweetheart' is in the concert room; and as a study or practice piece it can be heartily recommended to young or average executants, who will be pleased by sweet melody, and profited by musicianly arrangement and good harmony."—Brighton Guardian.

"This set of waltzes is by Mr. Wilford Morgan, having been founded by him on his popular song, 'My sweetheart when a boy,' which has frequently been sung in Belfast, and invariably well received. They keep strictly to the melody, are very skilfully put together, and are altogether much above the average of such compositions. Mr. Morgan, who is an old favourite in Belfast, accompanied the Royal Italian Opera Company during both their visits to this town. 'The Sweetheart Valse' has been published in a very tasteful form."—Northern Whig.

"This is a very elegant and melodious waltz, founded on the song of 'My sweetheart when a boy,' which has deservedly become exceedingly popular, which is also the composition of Mr. Wilford Morgan, a member of the Opera Company at present amongst us. The waltz is admirably adapted for dancing, is clear and brilliant, and presents no insuperable executive difficulties to pianists of ordinary acquirements, & by no means unattractive feature, whilst it is written in a highly musicianlike manner, and is a very pleasing piece for drawing-room performance."—Liverpool Daily Post.

NOTES UPON NOTES.

Before passing on to my Reminiscences of the Royal Academy of Music, let me be permitted to pause in order to record a slight "passage of arms" (or words) which I have had with a gentleman, whose opinion I value most highly on all other subjects—even in music; is well up in dates, and the character of music in the different centuries; also keenly alive to Carl Engel's two works on Music of the Ancients and National Music, but not the also excellent work by him on Church Psalmody—in which we are told that the real listener to music ought to be able to tell the sacred from the secular without the aid of words—also that an organist should be a good man. This gentleman does not believe in the difference of character between sacred and secular music. Certainly, after hearing my son-in-law (an amateur) sing "'Tis jolly to hunt," from Sir Sterndale Bennett's May Queen, our friend did not think it seemed suitable for an anthem! Time has something to do with the character of music—if you play a quadrille tune like a psalm, or a psalm like a quadrille tune. However, there has been a funny fashion of playing, or giving out, as I believe it is termed, as fast as possible, and then beginning the singing in regular time. I can but think that Mendelssohn's songs without words are not quite adapted to the organ for sacred purposes. For example, the association of ideas which music calls up would be, by music masters, for instance, in the visions of young ladies, floundering about over these easy songs without words. One of the most striking instances of different characters in music is, I think, to be found in the Elijah of Mendelssohn, between the chorus of the priests of Baal, and the really religious music in the rest of the oratorio. On an organ, for sacred purposes, it is as well to avoid all the "bubble and squeak" that may arise from taking music not calculated for that king of instruments (in one way). Albeit, I remember hearing of a performer, in the most solemn style upon it, who always, at the commencement of the sermon, took out The Weekly Dispatch, a bottle of port wine and filberts; and, on being censured, by the vestry on the subject, said, in his defence, that Mr. So-and-So was discovered playing at cribbage with the organ-blower behind the organ, and there was not half the fuss made with him on the matter.

The impressions that music may produce on the mind of the listener depends much on the mood of the aforesaid listener. If the mind is attuned to sacred subjects, much that might not have been intended for sacred music might appear as such to the listeners with the mind so attuned. Music has been classed as sacred and secular, or sacred and profane—classical and bravura;—and Dr. Crotch, in his "Lectures," arguing (by way of analogy) from Sir Joshua Reynolds' "Lectures upon Painting," describes music as possessing the attributes of "The sublime, the beautiful, and the ornamental—sacred music as belonging to the sublime." The intention of the composer should be thought of, I cannot but feel, in selecting music for sacred purposes; because, although Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven have written in their symphonies music that certainly appears almost like divine inspiration, yet they were not intended for sacred subjects. Again, the very fact of their being performed in the concert-room and in the drawing-room kindles up ideas of association with the secular—music for the stage, almost even worse, although taking such subjects as the prayer in the grand scena for soprano, in Der Freischütz, or the prayer from Masaniello. Mozart, in his Requiem, and in the Finale to Don Giovanni introduces similar passages in each, and with the same colouring of instrumentation (trombone, &c.)—yet I remember a very clever doctor of philosophy, accounting most plausibly for it (and I think with some truth), that Mozart felt there was a moral to be conveyed in that last scene in Don Giovanni. Mendelssohn (of whom it has been asserted that he knew the Bible by heart, and that as a self-interpreting book,)—how sacred is his sacred music!—how grand the "Hymn of Praise!" how comforting the "O rest in the Lord!" how wonderfully heart-searching the song, "But the Lord is mindful of his own!" and the solemn conclusion that must strike everyone with awe at the passage, "The Lord is near," ending in the half close, and without the aid of trumpets or drums, but with such quiet, simple grandeur! Then again—the "Still small voice" in the Elijah—where the music seems to add to the sublimity of the words. I heard a gentleman say the other day, that he read with increased pleasure, and I believe profit, all the passages of Scripture set to music in Mendelssohn's Elijah. In Sir Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria—what devotional feeling throughout!—"God is a spirit, and must be worshipped in spirit and in truth"—how simple and good!—almost seeming to imply that ceremonies or creeds do not belong to the feeling of the heart alone. Again, in the imagery of the accompaniment to "Thou knowest my down sitting"—in the absence of the bass at the commencement of the bar, one feels physically as if the chair were taken from under one.

What sermons Handel, Bach, and Haydn may have preached in their sacred music!—how much they may have searched out the good there is in every man! Sacred music is a universal teacher, adapted to all sects of religion. The very indefiniteness of music, without words to convey the intentions of the composer, has been by some considered its greatest and most mystical charm; at the same time I think it should be admitted that music that will conjure up the feelings of every-day or secular life should not be used for sacred purposes. Now to my "Reminiscences of the Royal Academy of Music." On a dismal night, when I left my home to travel with my father inside the coach up to London—the journey at that period taking a night and a day—the guard said it was not weather fit to turn a dog out of doors. However, the whole journey was full of interest to me who had been brought up in a country village: the arrival in London with its gas-lights; the hackney coach; the hackney coachman with his wooden clogs, are not to be forgotten, although occurring in childhood. The visits to the theatres; the Italian Opera, &c., never to be forgotten; the band of thirteen harps, under the direction of M. Bochsa; and, lastly, the examination of candidates for admission at the Royal Academy of Music, which took place in the evening, in the Concert Room of the present building, which had originally been the town house of the Earl of Carnarvon. The Board of Professors was very full of the most eminent musicians of the day. I recognized M. Bochsa, the then secretary to the Board of Professors, and to whom I had played at his house in Golden Square; also Mr. J. B. Cramer (to whom I had also played at his residence in Great Portland Street); also Mr. J. W. Holder, with whom we had been dining. There was also a sort of preliminary examination in the room below the Concert Room, where all the candidates remained for their turn to be called upstairs. Mr. Parker, sen., of Reading—whose son, Mr. Charles Parker, was a successful candidate, and who afterwards displayed such talent in composition as well as pianoforte playing—taking the lead. This served to while away the time, and was perhaps of some service in getting up the courage of many who were very timid. The male candidates admitted were—Henry Blagrove (the afterwards almost world-wide distinguished violinist—whose loss we have only lately had to mourn); Grattan Cooke, so justly celebrated as an oboe player; W. H. Phipps, who became distinguished as a composer and pianoforte player; Henry Greatorex, who left the Academy early from ill-health; Charles Sandy Parker, who, as I have before said, became so well known as a fine composer and pianoforte player; Alfred Devaux, clever as a theorist and a most skilful performer on the pianoforte (deceased); E. J. Neilson (also deceased), highly talented on harp, pianoforte, and in composition; T. M. Mudie, a very fine pianoforte performer, and excelling in composition; C. A. Seymour, distinguished as a violinist and leader; Mr. Kellow Pye, who became so excellent in composition and pianoforte, and who has taken his degree as Bachelor of Music, although retired from the profession: and your humble servant W. H. Holmes.

Leipsic.—Herr Ferdinand David will shortly resign his position as first Professor at the Conservatory of Music, and also as first violin at the Gewandhaus Concerts, being induced to take this step by ill-health. He has held both posts since the time of Felix Mendelssohn. Herr August Wilhelmj, of Wiesbaden, will, it is said, succeed him.

Gotha.—Despite Herr Richard Wagner's assertion that oratorios are "sexless operatic embryos," the members of the Musical Union lately gave an admirable performance of Handel's Judas Maccabæus, under the direction of Herr Hermann Tietz, pianist to the Court.

BABIL AND BIJOU.

Babil and Bijou still retaining its hold on public favour, the Covent Garden manager was fully justified in keeping it in the bills, and dispensing with the ordinary Christmas pantomime on "Boxing night." A more varied and magnificent fairy spectacle, indeed, has seldom been produced; and it is by no means the less attractive because music of a better class than usual is allowed to play a conspicuous part. Certain modifications and alterations in the piece, invented expressly for the occasion, are decidedly for the better; and the additional music has also an especial value. This includes a new finale to the second act, composed by Mr. W. H. Eayres; a ballad for Babil, by M. Rivière (conductor of the orchestra), which Mr. Maas, the promising young tenor, sings remarkably well; a charming duet for the hero and heroine (Mr. Maas and Miss Annie Sinclair), contributed by Mr. Frederick Clay, who originally set the whole of the second act; a song for Auricomus (Mr. Lionel Brough), which bears the familiar signature of Mr. R. Coote; a quaint and lively chorus for the "Bees," in Act IV.; a concerted piece for Mistigris (Mrs. Howard Paul), Bijou, Babil, Auricomus, Azurine (Miss Alice Phillips), and Wanda (Miss Annie Taylor), as well as a chorus of Pages—all three by M. Rivière; and last, not least, a tuneful and animated chorus of sutlers, camp followers, and Amazons, supplied by Mr. Clay. These add considerably to the musical significance of the work, and not less so, in the greater number of instances, to its liveliness. There are other new features in the general representation, of which it is enough to say that they are both ingenious and successful. One, however, calls for a word of recognition. Near the end of the last scene, the Princess Fontinbrasse, leader of the Amazons (in the stately person of Miss Helen Barry), introduces to the audience M. Collodian, from the Alcazar in Paris, where, as our readers may not have forgotten, he but lately earned some notoriety. M. Collodian gave specimens of his extraordinary talent as a rapid draughtsman. The one eliciting most attention was a pretended portrait of M. Thiers, which scarcely took a minute to trace, with black chalk, upon the canvas. It is said that, when the Alcazar was officially ordered to be closed for a fortnight, in consequence of a similar feat executed in that establishment under similar circumstances, the rapid draughtsman protested he did not mean the President of the French Republic at all, which, judging by the grotesque exhibition of last night, we may readily believe. What brought M. Collodion to the moon, however, in company with Babil and Bijou, and the Princess Fontinbrasse, it would puzzle Lord Dundreary to explain.

The "cast" of Babil and Bijou remains in all important particulars the same to which the public has been now for some months accustomed, and which, it must be admitted, stands in little need of improvement. It will, therefore, suffice to add that the almost unprecedentedly gorgeous ballet of the "Four Seasons"—with the graceful and finished dancing of Mdlle. Henriette D'Or, the wonderful agility of M. Espinosa as the dancing Dervish, and the unison chorus of boys (twice encored)—was, as always, the chief incident of the evening, and provoked the loudest and most unanimous applause. The house was crowded in every part, and the entire performance went off with the utmost spirit.

HAMBURGH.—The Stadttheater will be closed next season, the negotiations between the present manager and the proprietor of the building for a new lease having been broken off, and no one else having been found ready to assume the responsibility of an enterprise, hitherto, as a rule, so disastrous. The Municipality will once more be petitioned to grant the Theatre an annual subsidy of three hundred thousand thalers.

DARMSTADT.—A second concert was given the other day in aid of the Fund for the Widows and Orphans of Members of the Grand-Ducal Musical Establishment. The programme was an attractive one. The orchestra, under the direction of Herr Neswadba, performed Schubert's Symphony in C major, and Mendelssohn's Overture to Melusine. Herr Emil Scaria sang a number of songs, including Gounod's "Song of Spring," Schumann's "Lotosblume," and Marschner's "Kusa." He was much applauded in each. Herr Anton Urspruch, from Frankfort, played a Pianoforte Concerto, by Chopin, and the "Etudes symphoniques," by Schumann.

A GROWL FROM GRANDPAPA.

Wish me what? Many happy new Years?
When my years at the most must be few!
If one only prove happy, my dears,
'Twill be more than I ever got through.
Besides, whether they're happy or not,
Should my last year of all be this new,
You'll come in for whatever I've got,
And the sooner the better for you.

Punch.

WANTED: A LIVERPOOL MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From "The Liverpool Leader.")

The Welsh Choral Union, established some years ago, has been deservedly praised for the excellent concert with which its present season opened, at the Lord Nelson Street hall, when numerous sacred choruses and other difficult music were rendered in admirable style. Simultaneously we find it agreed on all sides that the Philharmonic chorus—long a byword of reproach—is so much improved that visitors from Manchester, Birmingham, and London praise it with much warmth; while the Musical Society, though without a building of its own, is running its elder competitor close in the general perfection and attractiveness of its concerts. Nor are these the only instances of the increasing devotion to high-class music which observers notice in Liverpool, for on all sides small organizations exist and are carried on with energy by conductors who find no difficulty in maintaining fairly efficient and numerous choruses; and the natural effect is that in private families there is a spreading acquaintance with the great masters, increased disposition to frequent concerts of a superior description, and a strengthened conviction that music must be included in the education of youth. All this imparts interest to the suggestion of the Daily Post, that Liverpool, the second place in the kingdom, should hold a periodical musical festival. The idea is so undeniably excellent that it cannot be opposed, though by whom, and how, it is to be organized we do not know. Our doubt, however, arises rather from the abundance than from the paucity of motive powers. The Philharmonic Society may claim the honourable right to lead; if this be neglected, there are gentlemen connected with the Musical Society who will soon occupy the vacant place. But from the Town Hall may appropriately come the first impulse; nor should this be hopeless, if it be remembered that our present Mayor is nothing if not artistic. Mr. Edward Samuelson probably wishes, as all his predecessors have wished, to leave his mark on Liverpool annals. Fancy fairs, fancy balls, endless dinners, hospital Sunday, teas to working men, entertainment of channel fleets, and various other devices have been resorted to; but this has not yet had its turn, and as no one likes to be called an imitator, Mr. Samuelson may find in it his opportunity. Never had a Liverpool mayor so suitable a time or opportunity to raise this town in the estimation of the musical world. Will the present occupant of the civic chair use his position, his business tact, and his cultivated sympathies to give an impulse which is much needed, and which will bring high honour to Liverpool?

FRANKFORT, January 9th (Extract from a letter).—A concert of particular attraction took place this evening at the rooms of the Saalban, given by Fraulein Lilly Oswald, and Mr. Charles Oberthür, the celebrated harpist, from London. Although a great many concerts have taken place here lately, and Ullman's being in view for Saturday next, the rooms were well filled by a most fashionable and appreciative audience. According to the programme, the concert ought to have begun with Mr. Oberthür's Trio, original, for violin, violoncello, and harp, in F minor, but a printed notice informed the audience that the performance of this Trio had been prevented through the endeavours of a clique; and we understood that the leader of this miserable manœuvre was a person also well known in London as a clever executant. We, of course, can only look with contempt on such proceedings. Mr. Oberthür, whose liberality and generosity towards other artists is well known, need not grieve about the intrigues of such despicable creatures; the less so as the piece which he substituted for the Trio, viz., his own Concertino, with pianoforte accompaniment, has met with enormous success—he having been recalled most unanimously—as also afterwards, when he played his effective solo, "Clouds and sunshine." Fraulein Lilly Oswald, who already is favourably known in London, played Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," one of Mendelssohn's "Songs without words," Chopin's "Etude in E Major," and a "Valse-Impromptu" by W. Hill, with such poetical expression and faultless execution as to elicit the warmest appreciation of the audience, resulting in unanimously recalling the fair artist, Fraulein Oswald also joined Mr. Oberthür in his Duo Brillante on Oberon, which, in such hands, proved one of the gems of the evening. Frau Charlotte Reger sang "Ah quel giorno," from Rossini's Semiramide, Blumenthal's "Adonai," and a song by Liebe, in all of which her beautiful contralto voice produced great effect, she having also been recalled each time. Herr R. Simon, who is in possession of a remarkably fine tenor voice, and sings with taste and musical feeling, sang a highly dramatic Aria by V. Lachner, composed for Lortzing's opera, Undine, and also a song by Goltermann, deservedly partaking of the same distinction as the other artists already named. Herr T. Kahl, who officiated as conductor, deserves particular notice for his musician-like playing of the accompaniments, especially the more difficult ones to Oberthür's Concertino, and the Aria to Undine. The concert was patronized by the Duke of Nassau, and the principal nobility residing in Frankfort.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

The second of two morning concerts—forerunners of a series of eight evening entertainments—took place in St. James's Hall, on Saturday, and attracted, as did the first, a large and well-pleased audience. Mr. John Boosey's enterprise is now in its seventh season, but there are no signs to indicate that the public have had enough of it. The signs, in point of fact, are all the other way, and suggest that "a good song, well sung" grows in favour, as a taste for music becomes more and more diffused. We see no reason why the case should be otherwise; why the humible ballad should be left behind in the forward march of art. The ballad has a place and uses which only folly would ignore. Its influence is proverbial, and when composers of mark and singers of eminence take it in hand, they do a work of more value and significance than is generally recognised. For these reasons we look upon Mr. Boosey's concerts with a sincere desire that, carried on as now, they may endure and prosper. They provide enjoyable entertainment of a kind all can appreciate, and they tend to elevate the standard of public taste in regard to the most popular of musical forms.

Saturday's programme contained a large proportion of old songs which have taken a place in the national repertory. Thus, Miss Edith Wynne sang "The harp that once through Tara's halls," and "Robin Adair," her charming talent doing equal justice to both. Madame Patey was heard in "She wore a wreath of roses;" Mr. Sims Reeves gave "The last rose of summer" (encored), and Stephenson's "Sigh no more, ladies;" and Mr. Santley contributed "The lass of Richmond Hill," as well as a capital and piquant ditty, "Fair Hebe I left." Dussek's "Name the glad day" (Miss Banks), and Purcell's "What shall I do to show how much I love her?" (Mr. Nordblom,) completed a group of songs which, in point of merit, would be hard to excel. We are not going to make comparisons between them and the chosen representatives of modern art, but it might safely be said that no laudator temporis acti present on Saturday afternoon had reason to blush for his preference in the matter of ballad music. The new songs were none the less well received in consequence. Miss Wynne had to repeat Molloy's "So the story goes"—a composition destined for great popularity; and the talent of Mdme. Patey secured an encore for Gatty's "Unspoken." Mr. Reeves delighted everybody in Molloy's "Dreams," and Mr. Santley successfully introduced "The British Tar," by Messrs. J. V. Bridgeman and J. Hatton. It may be hard to associate "Jack" with a modern ironclad—monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens—but traditions of the "saucy Arethusa" days are still cherished, and the prowess of the British tar is always a safe theme, which, by the way, Mr. Bridgeman has treated with rare felicity. Mr. Hatton's energetic music, finely sung, obtained a well-merited encore. Some concerted pieces were agreeably rendered by the Orpheus Quartet Union, and the pianoforte solos of Mdlle. del Bianca gave further variety to the programme. Messrs. Hatton and Meyer Lutz were accompanists.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

If Mr. Arthur Chappell had determined upon making the renewal of these concerts a special attraction, he emphatically took the right course to gain his end. Beethoven is a name of power, and, to the charm of a "Beethoven night," as such, was added that of a selection from the great tone-poet's most popular works. Familiarity, indeed, characterised the programme not less than excellence, every item being well known to the Monday frequenters of St. James's Hall. Like their countrymen generally, Mr. Chappell's patrons have quite settled that a musical old acquaintance should never be forgot, and they are as delighted to hear a quartet for the fourteenth or fifteenth time as elderly habitués of Mr. Boosey's Ballad Concerts are to hear songs which were the familiars of their "hot youth." Hence an overflowing audience on Monday evening, and a degree of enjoyment—measuring enjoyment by applause—which might encourage the director to go on repeating the works his public best know. Happily, Mr. Chappell is trusted to continue doing for art and artistic education the good service rendered during many years. The doctrine of finality does not enter into the Monday Popular scheme, and we may look for things novel, as well as things known, till the supply stops—an event about which the present generation need not worry itself.

The concert opened with the quartet in E minor (Op. 59)—one of the set of three dedicated to Prince Rasoumowsky, and generally accepted as illustrating the composer's "second manner" to perfection. Nothing in the Monday Popular repertory is more welcome or better understood than this great work, and its not less great companions. MM. Straus, Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti addressed themselves, therefore, to critical ears; but, though the wonderful Adagio has been interpreted with a greater power of expression, the general result was as satisfactory as the artists themselves could have desired. It need scarcely be said that, if any present were unequal to the Adagio, the melodious theme of the Finale, with its characteristic episodes, could not but charm the entire audience; and it was mainly for a good performance of this exquisite Rondo that Herr Straus and his associates were called back to the platform. The next concerted piece—Serenade in D, for violin, viola, and violoncello—shares, with the Kreutzer sonata, Mozart's clarionet quintet, the octet of Schubert, and one or two other works in the almost unlimited favour of Mr. Chappell's public. Its themes are known by heart, and all its movements, from the march which begins to the march which ends, are heard with greedy attention. How every portion of the work was applauded need not, under these circumstances, be told. Enough that Beethoven's light and airy speech received the homage of unmistakably genuine admiration—a result not always attendant upon his more recondite utterances. Mdme. Goddard was associated with Herr Straus in the performance of the Sonata in G (Op. 30), for violin and pianoforte, another old and esteemed favourite at these concerts. That the two artists did justice both to themselves and to Beethoven will readily be assumed. Talent so tried and proven as theirs could not fail of this result, especially when brought to bear upon music so congenial and familiar. Mdme. Goddard's solo was the Thirty-two Variations in C minor, played by her last season with such great and deserved success. We might exhaust the language of eulogy upon this wonderful illustration of Beethoven's fancy; but, like good wine, it "needs no bush." Mdme. Goddard's audience, at all events, needed no more than her quiet and unaffected exposition of its beauties, between admiration of which and of the artist's skill their sympathies were equally divided. This two-fold triumph of creative and executive genius was, indeed, the chief feature of the evening. Mr. Santley sang Meyerbeer's "Le Moine," accompanied by Mr. Zerbini, with all the dramatic power it requires; and his really magnificent delivery of Handel's "Revenge, Timotheus cries," led to a vociferous recall and encore.

VIENNA.—The members of the Vienna Singing Academy, who have ever been the zealous champions of elevated serious choral compositions of all ages, have introduced at their recent concerts four-part a capella choruses by Antonio Scandellus (1568); and Bartholomæus Gesius (1605).—The annual report of the Imperial Opera has appeared with its usual punctuality. It extends from the 1st December, 1871, to the 30th November, 1872. The number of novelties produced at the new Operahouse were two: Feramors, by Herr Anton Rubinstein, and Abu Hassan, by C. M. von Weber. Ten operas of the old house were remounted in the new. The opera most frequently performed was M. Gounod's Faust, 16 times; then came Rienzi, 11 times; and the Africaine, Lohengrin, and Der Freischütz, 16 times each. It appears that by far the highest average receipts are those of Meyerbeer's operas. An average evening's receipts (not counting the subscriptions), when one of his works is played, is 2735 florins; for Wagner they are 2621; for Thomas, 2559; for Gluck, 2526; for Flotow, 2524; for Mozart, 2317; for Weber, 2294; for Donizetti, 2265; for Gounod, 2119; and for Auber, 1739. The repertory now consists of 48 operas and 9 ballets. The operas are by 25 different composers, Meyerbeer, Mozart, and Wagner representing 5 operas each; Donizetti, 4; Auber, Verdi, and Weber, 3 each; Bellini and Gounod, 2 each: Adam, Beethoven, Boildieu, Cherubini, Doppler, Flotow, &c., 1 each.—At a crowded meeting held a short time since, the Wiener Musikerbund, or Associated Musicians of Vienna, passed the following resolution: "The Associated Musicians of Vienna consider its matter of regret that persons have been appointed to the direction of the Hofburgtheater, who pay no regard to the dictates of humanity and justice, and who make so reckless and unworthy a use of the power which they possess over the persons engaged in the Institution. The Associated Musicians of Vienna declare further that the conduct of Count Wrbna, Intendant-General, and Herr Dingelstedt, director of the Hofburgtheater, as a theatre subsidised by the State, towards the members of the orchestra, to be utterly abominable." The Associated Musicians must consider the musicians of the Hofburgtheater to have been indeed ill-used, before they would have used such strong language towards two high government officials. The public will, no doubt, ere long hear more about this affair.

DRESDEN.—The Dresdener Journal says it knows, on good authority, that some anonymous admirers of Schumann's music have subscribed thirty thousand thalers to found a Schumann Exhibition Fund, and have lodged the money in the hands of the composer's widow.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, 1873.

ONE of the most suggestive contributions to musical literature which have recently been made, either in this country or abroad, has appeared in the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung, signed "Jost van der Lüchten." We feel sure that our readers will thank us for the subjoined translation, however much they may disagree with the writer's opinion :—

The German proverb, "Böse Menschen haben keine Lieder" ("Bad men have no songs"), is fully borne out by entire nations, as well as by isolated distinguished individuals. Among the peoples of the old world were included the Indo-Germans, the Celts, the Semitic tribes, the Mongolians (Finns), and the Sclaves (Russians, Poles, and Bohemians). Among all these races—and are they not the strongest and noblest in the world?—among all these races a love for music, and the highest natural aptitude for that most beautiful of all arts, are a fundamental and characteristic feature, without which they would cease to be what they are. Among modern Romanic mixed races the love and cultivation of music are innate qualities, in so far only as the progenitors of these races originally possessed the qualities in question, and bequeathed them in due course to their successors. Everything else is simply acquired—and is, in consequence, again forgotten, a fact indisputably proved by the instance of Italy. For this reason, too, we do not find among them such stores of genuine folks' songs as we find, for example, in Germany, Finnland, Sweden, and Norway, Scotland, &c. The genuine folk's song—as Goethe long since pointed out—is something rare in Italy, and still more so in France. The heroic romances of the Spaniards and Portuguese grew principally upon Semitic (Moorish) soil, just like the Alhambra, that song in stone of a grandeur now passed away.

The mixed Romanic races, compared with the mighty primitive races of the Germans, the Sclaves, and the Mongols, have, properly speaking, no past; and it is only in the depths of the past that the folks' song strikes root. It is in the past alone that the sturdy or the tender shoots of the folks' song can find nourishment and can flourish; and it is, moreover, only upon such a basis that a healthy and permanent future can be established.

And as with entire nations, so it is also with certain highly favoured individuals! We would remind the reader of the Orphicæ, the Homeridæ, of Plato, Aristotle, David, King Arthur—(there is a great deal of history in the earliest legends of Arthur and Merlin)—Alfred, Charlemagne, the Hohenstaufen, Maximilian I., Frederick the Great, and Prince Louis Ferdinand; further, of Calderon, Petrarch, Dante, Salvator Rosa, and Shakespeare, together with the "Minnesänger," and the "Meistersänger." Who would not include all these men, producers and lovers of songs, among the class of good men? Those horrible beings, Philip and Peter, on the other hand—Napoleon, &c,—were not fond of music; nay, they actually hated or despised it. They had no songs!

So far, therefore, is the honest proverb with which we set out completely corroborated by history.

But Nero—the most ferocious, the most bloodthirsty, and the most cowardly of all tyrants—Nero, the matricide, the Herostratus of the Capitol and of the Eternal City, Nero, the torturer of the Christians—was he not also an enthusiastic admirer of art, a virtuoso on the lyre, a singer, dancer, and charioteer, and, as such, admired and praised by his contemporaries?

Has his wickedness been exaggerated—or was his love of art simply affectation?

With regard to the first point, this is not the place to enter into an investigation. The reader is referred for information to the biography given of the Emperor by Suetonius (especially cap. IX. and sequence), and to the treatise, De Clementia, by his master, Seneca; to Aurelius Victor and Tacitus—each of whom has many an honourable fact, much that is indicative of nobleness of mind, and goodness of heart, to relate under the reign of Nero. With regard to the second question—namely, whether the enthusiasm manifested by the tyrant for art was true and genuine?—we will here give a couple of anecdotes not generally known; they are, perhaps, not ill-calculated to assist the reader in arriving at a definite opinion concerning Nero's artistic capabilities and love for art.

After having been brought up almost in poverty, scarcely had Nero ascended the throne, before he summoned to the court at Rome Terpus, esteemed the most celebrated musician of his day, in order, under his direction, to perfect himself on the harp and the zither, both instruments on which he had been accustomed to play from his youth. At the same time, he studied singing, and, in the course of a year, made such progress in these different departments of the art, that he was able to appear in public side by side with approved virtuosi; and, at a musical festival given at Naples, he actually won the prize as the best player on the harp. But the golden laurel wreath handed him by the umpire was placed by Nero upon the head of the statue of Augustus, to whom divine honours were paid as the protector of art and science.

On making his first appearance on the stage at this festival, Nero was interrupted by the shock of an earthquake. Without being put out, however, he calmly went on till he had ended the hymn he had begun, exciting thereby the people to thunders of applause. He himself was moved to tears. His fame spread all over Italy. The most celebrated artists flocked from all quarters to hear him and pay him their respects.

When the imperial singer returned, the Senatus populusque Romanus were, of course, also in a state of great excitement to hear him—though, as a rule, there was not much feeling for art, especially music, among the descendants of Cato. In reply to the openly-expressed desire of the people, Nero said that he would sing publicly in the Imperial Gardens on the festival of his birthday, then near at hand. The people, however, and his body-guard, were not very contented with this promise. They wanted their unanimous desire to be immediately granted. Without being angry, the Emperor, tired as he was, drove to the theatre, and immediately sang, to a harp accompaniment, the tragic history of Niobe, adding a long succession of hymns, heroic and erotic, to the tragic composition with which he began. He sang on to a late hour in the night—to the great delight of the people.

Once, when the Emperor was performing the character of Hercules when mad, and, as was requisite, appeared loaded with chains, a soldier of the body-guard was so affected by the touching singing and the animated acting, that, with drawn sword, he rushed upon the stage to help the Emperor. Nero was so pleased at what the soldier had done that he ordered an immense sum (above thirty thousand pounds sterling) to be paid him. The Emperor's mother heard of this immoderate and—as she thought—useless piece of extravagance, ordered the money to be heaped up on a table in a certain chamber through which the Emperor must pass. Nero, who—in regular imperial fashion—had forgotten all about his order, saw the large amount of gold, and asked his treasurer for what it was intended. The treasurer replied dejectedly that it was put there for the soldier of the day before. The Emperor instantly perceived that his mother had cunningly calculated on his regretting his extravagance, which she considered so ill-advised. He said, therefore: "You have done well to remind me. So heroic and noble a deed as that of this soldier really deserves a more fitting reward—let him be paid double this sum."

In order to appreciate duly the above fact, we must recollect that Cicero, Mæcenas, and the divine Augustus himself, had squandered enormous sums on banquets, dancing-girls, luxurious residences, &c., and that Seneca, the panegyrist of poverty, eat off silver plate, without anyone having found the slightest fault with such extravagance.

Of all the public entertainments, dramatic and vocal, however, which the Emperor got up, not one was characterised by the same splendour, or so pleased the people of Rome, as that in the Theatre of Pompeius, where Tiridates, the vanquished King of Armenia, laid his crown and sceptre at the Emperor's feet, and, kneeling down, acknowledged himself the vassal and subject of Rome. When the King had concluded his speech, Nero raised him, and, decorating him again with the crown, made him sit by his side upon the throne. Then came a grand dramatic-musical entertainment, which the astounded barbaric monarch witnessed as he sat by the Emperor. On this day Nero struck the Romans as so generous, that they called it the "golden" day.

On the return of the Armenian monarch, the Emperor travelled through Greece, appearing with the greatest success on the stage as a singer and harpist at Athens, Thebes, Sparta, and Corinth. He relieved Greece, the birthplace of art, from all imposts, and showered gifts with Imperial liberality on singers and cithern-players—returning, at length, crowned with glory and triumph, to the City of the Seven Hills.

Can so large-hearted and imaginative a man and artist have been quite so like the sombre portrait drawn of him in our schools? Nero's successor, the prosaic Galba, has not left an equally glorious name in the annals of musical art. On one occasion, when a celebrated flautist had played before him, he made him a present of—a Roman shilling!

The shade of Nero ought to be very grateful to Herr Jost van der Lüchten; who has evidently been reading the Encomium Neronis of Jerome Cardan, author of the celebrated treatises, De Subtilitate and De Immortalitate Animi.

LES TROIS AMANTS.

M. EMILE GIRARDIN'S moral or immoral play, on the great question of the punishment of unfaithful wives, having been found unfitted for the stage, has been published in a book form. Les Trois Amants is the title of the piece, which is written in two acts for five principal characters—the "three lovers" themselves and two ladies, between whom their love is unequally distributed. The first lover is rich and cynical, and purchases what he calls "love" from one Cora—a name which, on the French stage, seems always associated with brilliancy and heartlessness. The second lover also loves Cora, unbeknown to the first; while the third loves the wife of the second, unbeknown to the second—but platonically, so that there can be no valid excuse for killing him in the last act. The natural consequence of all this misplaced affection is trouble and confusion. The first lover, finding that he has been deceived by the second, proposes to fight him; while the second, finding that he has been deceived by the third, sees the necessity of fighting both third and first. The middle man is in a terrible position, for besides meeting both the lover who has betrayed him, and the lover he has betrayed, he is called upon to give "three year's indemnity" to Cora, as compensation for having allowed her infidelity to be discovered. He hands over the fixed price, 600,000 francs, without a murmur, as though he were paying a gambling debt, when the first lover arranges that his duel with the second lover shall not come off, on the understanding that the projected duel shall not come off between the second lover and the third. This drama, or proposition, with symbols in lieu of characters, has less the look of an argument against wife murder, which it is said to be, than against duelling. The wife in M. de Girardin's play has been guilty only of sentimental flirtation, for which even the most virtuous of French dramatists, even M. Alexandre Dumas fils himself, would scarcely award the punishment of death. On the other hand, we find two duels about to be fought from wounded vanity (the true motive of nine duels out of ten), and prevented by a little timely explanation and reflection. M. de Girardin's piece was, it seems, written seven years ago. Probably it was not until after the success of the younger Dumas' Homme-Femme that it occurred to M. de Girardin to regard Les Trois Amants as bearing on the important social and dramatic question of the day.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

It was in Liverpool, at the old Liver Theatre, that Mr. Sims Reeves made his début in Italian Opera, his performance in Lucia di Lammermoor being remembered by a scene that marked the confidence of the assured artist. On an "encore" being demanded of a certain air by a majority of the audience, an opposition cry was raised by a small foreigner-loving minority. The young singer, nowise abashed, came forward, coolly remarking—"What, ladies and gentleman, is that a hiss I hear?"—and thereupon, turning his back to the audience, he left the stage, not exactly taking with him the sympathy of the house at such an unwonted display of boldness on the part of a débutante, although his enthusiastic admirers—and these were nine out of ten among the audience—by clamorous, but vain, demonstrations, strove to bring him back. If at times an unjust imputation has been raised against Mr. Reeves, it may safely be said that the public only reaps the benefit of his careful husbanding of a voice which we hope will long be preserved to the delight of all true lovers of genuine and perfect song.

FROM Vienna we learn that the long expected appearance of Verdi's Opera Aïda is postponed sine die by reason that the composer, after all other business had been arranged, demanded

Digitized by Google

25,000 francs (£1,000) for personally directing its production. The directors of the Royal Opera House refused to pay so extravagant a sum, for which men of such reputation as Meyerbeer and Gounod would not have ventured to ask. After a sharp and angry correspondence the directors finally offered 2,000 francs (£80), a moderate renumeration, it must be owned. To this offer the Maestro vouchsafed no reply; and, to the no small disappointment of the Viennese public, the directors abandoned the idea of producing Aida and took up Hamlet, which they expect will run until April.—H. L. B.

We learn from Le Ménestrel that a most interesting relic has just been brought to Paris. It is a large oaken arm-chair, in which no less a person than Molière has often sat. We know that the illustrious comedian left Paris in 1646, and travelled through the Southern provinces of France till 1658. During his peregrinations, he met the Governor of Languedoc, who was no other than an old fellow-scholar of his at the College of the Jesuits, namely: Armand de Bourbon, first Prince de Conti. The Prince kept Molière with him for some time in the town of Pézenas, where he resided in preference to anywhere else. Molière arranged the fêtes given by the Government during the session of the States. There were no coffee-houses in those days, and the inhabitants used to meet at the shop of a barber, named Gelly. It was at Gelly's that Molière used to sit in the chair; it was at Gelly's that he studied the gestures and listened to the conversation of the natives; and it was at Gelly's that he learned the Pézenas dialect which he introduced in Monsieur de Pourceaugnac.

Sacred Harmonic Society.—Handel's Israel in Egypt will be given by the Sacred Harmonic Society, at Exeter Hall, on Friday next, with Miss Edith Wynne, Madame Patey, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Lewis Thomas and Mr. Santley as principal vocalists. Sir Michael Costa will conduct the performance.

PROVINCIAL.

Liverpool.—Apropos of a concert given in St. George's Hall, by Mr. Charles Hallé, the Porcupine said:—

"In every number of the programme the performance of the orchestra was excellent; but they particularly distinguished themselves in the overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream. The quaint and delicate harmonies and luxuriant instrumentation of this fascinating composition were realised in the most complete manner. The principal orchestral number, Mozart's Jupiter Symphony, was equally well rendered; but the superior popularity of the former work gave its execution a preference in the estimation of the audience. We were glad to see Mr. Hallé availing himself of the services of a local vocalist, Madame Billinie Porter, who discharged her duties with a fair amount of efficiency. The solo instrumentalists were Madame Norman-Néruda, Herr Straus, and Mr. Hallé himself. The grace, refinement, and delicate emphasis of the lady's playing were as conspicuous as ever. In the duo by Bach she was ably seconded by Herr Straus. Mr. Hallé's contribution was a charming Valse Caprice in E, by Schubert and Liszt, played with all the great pianist's finish and more than his usual verve and spirit. We, who have so often cried out for delicate orchestral accompaniments, must not close without congratulating the band on their excellence in this department. Their playing with the voice and the violins in Bach's concerto was all that could be desired for refinement and sympathetic restraint."

Colchester.—From the Essex Standard we extract the following:—

"The record of the series of concerts, by the members of the Glee Club, recently formed in connexion with this Institution, was given in the Lecture Room, St. John Street, and, although there were two or three counter attractions, the large room was wholly inadequate to contain the numbers who flocked thither; and, while many were unable to gain admission, a considerable number were compelled to stand throughout the entertainment. The gems of the evening's programme were the pianoforte solos of Mr. W. H. Holmes, of the Royal Academy of Music. His rendering of the solo, 'The Home Song,' and 'The Night Dancers' (the latter written by our talented townsman, Mr. D. Pegler, for Her Majesty's private band), were enthusiastically received. Mr. F. Holmes, also of the Royal Academy of Music, sang two or three songs in first-class style, especially 'The Vagabond.' A duet by the Misses Darken; and one by Mrs. Winterbon and Mr. Crews, were also well received. Mrs. C. Winterbon was rapturously encored in 'The beating of my own Heart,' and in reply gave 'Robin Red Breast.' The other solos were 'Esmeralda,' and 'Song of the Old Bell,' which were very nicely rendered by Miss Bessie Darken and Mr. Ladell respectively. The selections chosen for performance by the Glee Club were Auber's chorus, 'O, Power Supreme!' Sullivan's part-song, 'O, hush Thee;' part-song, 'Tell me, Roses' (Barnby); and two selections from Mendelssohn's open air choruses, 'Autumn Song' and 'Vale of Rest,' and they were much applauded. There were but two readings, viz.: 'A Reminiscence of the Old Coaching Days,' and 'The Bashful Man,' by Mr. W. T. Hodson, which excited a good deal of merriment. Mr. C. Winterbon acted throughout the musical portion of the entertainment as conductor in his usual efficient manner, and the whole thing passed off excellently. The proceeds are to be devoted to the liquidation of the debt incurred in re-decorating the Lecture Room."

Birmingham.—There was a good attendance, in the assembly room of the Masonic Hall, at the concert given by the choir of St. Philip's Church. Among the instrumental features of the concert were two movements from Hummel's "Septet," the performance of which was in highly competent hands (Mdlle. Le Brun taking the pianoforte part), and two solos by Chopin and Liszt, executed by the same pianist, of whose performance The Birmingham Gazette says:—"In her rendering of both these pieces—which are widely different in character and style—she evinced not only a firm, free, and flexible twist, a neat, even, and skilful execution, but also a vigour, earnestness, and expressiveness of style, very different from the mere clever, mechanical playing of too many of our modern pianists." The part songs were the principal feature in the vocal part of the programme, and were effectively given. Mr. C. J. B. Meacham was the conductor.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

To a very interesting article on Mr. Gilbert's admirable and delightful new play, The Wicked World, the able dramatic critic of the Sunday Times has the following peroration:—

"So ends this charming play; one of the brightest and daintiest fancies Mr. Gilbert has yet woven into dramatic shape. Nothing but the mere outline is apparent from our story. For the beautiful details we must refer the reader to the play itself, which, for many a night to come, is likely to remain one of the most pleasing as one of the most intellectual of London entertainments. It is not very clear to those who do not pay close attention, and it is not provided with any strong dramatic interest. It is, however, something which, for a change at least, is better than stronger qualities, and with men of culture it is sure to be a favourite. Its blank verse is subtle and good, and is agreeable, humorous, and fluent, without claiming any higher quality. The work has, however, the decided stamp of Mr. Gilbert's originality, and that originality is one destined to endure and be discussed by succeeding generations. To carp at the treatment of scenes would not be difficult. It is pleasanter, however, to point to a work in blank verse which fulfils every requirement of classic art, and rouses to absolute delight a modern English audience. Such work is scarce, and we hope Mr. Gilbert will give us more."

To every word of which we zealously exclaim—"Amen!"—Not for a quarter of a century have we seen anything so original and so captivating as this same "Wicked World."

REVIEWS.

Augener & Co.

The Monthly Musical Record. Vols. I. and II.

These volumes should be in the library of every musician, not only because they supply an "abstract and brief chronicle of the (musical) time," but also because they contain very many valuable articles, useful for reference, and most instructive to the non-professional reader. Being issued at intervals of a month, and, therefore, free from the hurry and scramble of weekly publications, the Record is able to come forth with deliberate and well-considered utterances. This, indeed, is its distinguishing feature; and, though we may not be able to agree with all its opinions, the manner in which these opinions are advanced secures our respect. Perhaps we can best indicate the character of the serial by mentioning a few of the more conspicuous writings in the volume before us. Thus Mr. Ebenezer Prout sends interesting analyzes, with music-type illustrations, of Schubert's Masses and Schumann's Symphonies; Herr Pauer contributes a mass of valuable information with respect to writers for the instrument he professes, and Mr. Dannreuther supplies some very well written articles on Wagner and his theories. Further, the department of foreign music is admirably attended to; all the new publications of note being discussed at length and with much acumen. To sum up, the Record fills an important place in our musical literature—a place distinct from that of the weekly journals, but one of equal consequence, and we are glad, however much we may differ in matters of opinion, to witness so much earnestness, ability, and zeal for the interest of art.

Ball Scenes. Nine Characteristic Pieces for two Performers on the Pianoforte. By ROBERT SCHUMANN (Op. 109). Edited by E. PAUER.

THE most zealous detractor of Robert Schumann must admit that his smaller works for the piano are works of high originality and very distinctive merit. No composer has enriched the repertory of the "household instrument" with more beautiful thoughts, elegantly expressed; and, therefore, we welcome the publication of his Ball Scenes as an important addition to those lighter fancies which best serve to spread a composer's reputation among the community at large. There is no reason why these nine pieces should not find their way into drawing-rooms which are inexorably closed against classical music. Not that they are unclassical, but that, being classical, they are, at the same time, adapted to charm the popular ear by reason of "catching" themes, and a cheerful, pleasant spirit. The series begins with a Preambule, and is continued through a Polonaise, Walzer, Ungarisch, Francaise, Mazurka, Ecossaise, and Schnell Walzer, to the final Promenade. In not a few movements grave students of music will find much to charm them; and, as a whole, they possess interest derived from the remarkable man whose lighter labours they represent.

DUFF & STEWART.

A Fig for the Vicar. Song in the Lady of the Lake, arranged with original Symphonies and Accompaniments by W. C. LEVEY.

THIS song having become familiar, owing to its performance at Drury Lane, throughout the run of Mr. Halliday's latest adaptation from Scott, we need do little more than simply mention it. Those who love a good, jolly, old English effusion will find here something to please them. Mr. Levey's share of the work serves its purpose well enough.

Quel Ruscelletto, che l'onde Chiare. Canzonetta. Composta di ED. RUBINI.

THIS song, though somewhat conventional in type, and lacking originality, is pretty, and adapted to display a good legato style. As it is easy, and of moderate compass, amateur tenors who affect Italian songs may do worse than give it a share of patronage.

Dream of Angels, Little One. Song. Words by GEORGE COOPER. Composed by FRANZ ABT.

THE verses of this cradle song are well written, and Herr Abt has wedded them to some very pretty and attractive music. As usual in the works of this composer the accompaniment plays a prominent part, and adds no little to the general effect. It is extremely tasteful, and the song deserves to take rank as a favourite.

Sotto un Capella Rosa (Biondina, No. 2). Parole di G. LAFFIRA. Music di CHARLES GOUNOD.

SIMPLICITY is the chief characteristic of this effusion; the simplicity of which is so uniform that hardly a peg is presented on which to hang a remark. M. Gounod has rarely sent out a more obvious "pot-boiler;" and we should not be at all surprised, looking at the commonplace prettiness of the music, if it answered its purpose, and boiled the pot effectively. Key, E flat; voice, soprano or tenor.

The Passing Ship. Words by the Earl of PEMBROKE. Music by VIRGINIA GABRIEL.

A TALE of the sea is here told with effect by both poet and musician. Miss Gabriel has written her music tastefully, and refrained from any excursion likely to carry her out of her depth; although she begins on the dominant seventh, and although there is a C sharp in the seventh bar which challenges anybody to tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth. We have pleasure in approving the song as a whole.

JOSEPH WILLIAMS.

Lenore. Mazurka for the Piano. By GEORGE BARNARD.

THIS is a Mazurka of an animated, not to say brilliant, character. It is copiously fingered. Key, F major.

J. F. PETIT.

I would if I were You. Ballad. Written by SYLVETER C. Composed by W. LOVELL PHILLIPS.

WE have here a re-issue of a song once connected with the name of Miss Poole. The chief interest lies in some piquant verses to which Mr. Phillips's easy music is wholly subordinate. Well sung, it can hardly fail to be well received in the "social circle."

Welcome Home. Galop de Concert pour Piano. Par IMMANUEL LIEBICH.

A GALOP of unusual vivacity. It is more difficult than the general run of its kind, but will repay the trouble of preparation.

LAMBORN COCK.

Love, what wilt thou? Words by LONGFELLOW. Music by LINDA.

WHOEVER "Linda" may be, she has no occasion to hide herself, as regards this song, behind a nom de plume. The music is written not only with a keen feeling for the words, and much power of forcible expression, but also with such technical skill as is very rarely met with in the works of lady composers. We have no hesitation in saying that Linda's effusion is one of the best songs of recent years, and as such we commend it to public favour. Key, E flat; compass, moderate.

DUNCAN DAVISON & Co.

Two Duets for Two Performers on one Pianoforte. Composed by HEINRICH STIEHL.

WE do not remember having met with the name of Herr Stiehl before; but, if these duets be an average specimen of his work, we shall be glad to meet with it again. The music before us is the work of a musician and an artist, who evidently deserves a helping hand. Duet No. 1 is an Allegro in G major, light and fanciful as to character, extremely pleasing, and quite easy. The second, in F minor, opens with a March, Andante, leading to an expressive melody in F major, which, in turn, is followed by a resumption of the first theme. This, also, is easy; and we commend both pieces to the notice of amateurs as being thoroughly adapted to their requirements.

Celebrated Overtures for the Pianoforte.

WE have here twenty-three popular and celebrated overtures, arranged for the pianoforte either by their respective composers or by the capable hands of Diabelli. The list comprises Beethoven's Men of Prometheus, Mozart's La Clemenza, Don Giovanni, Le Nozze, and Die Zauberflöte, Handel's Samson and Occasional Oratorio; Rossini's Il Barbiere, Tancredi, Gazza Ladra, and Otello; and Weber's Der Freischutz. As all these masterpieces are adapted to the use of moderately-skilled performers, we need say but little in favour of Messrs. Davison & Co.'s edition. It is cheap and well printed, and should be well patronized.

The Royal Leamington Spa Waltzes. For the Pianoforte. Composed by ALBERT DAVIES.

THERE are some graceful melodies in these waltzes, which, moreover, are easy to play, and thoroughly dansants.

The Marriage Bells. Song. Written by R. CLOTHIER. Music by W. F. TAYLOR.

THE popularity of this song would be secured by its title-page, whereon a wreath of orange blossoms surround two hands in the act of giving and receiving the ring. But the words and music are attractive in their way, the latter aiming at a good deal of realistic effect.

MUNICH.—Third Soirée for Chamber Music, given by Herren J. Vensl, Ch. Lehner, C. Hieber, and J. Werner, took place in the large hall of the Museum. The programme contained Quartet in E flat major, Cherubini; three Scotch Songs, with piano, violin, and violoncello, Beethoven; "Concerto Grosso" for two violins, and violoncello, two oboes, two violins (ripieno), tenor, double-bass, and piano, G. F. Handel; two Songs with Harp, Fr. Lachner, and F. Mendelssohn; Quartet in E, Op. 47, for piano, violin, tenor, and violoncello, R. Schumann.—The fourth and last Subscription Concert was devoted to Handel's oratorio of Judas Maccabæus. The solos were entrusted to Madame Diez, Mdlle. Meysenheim, Herren Fischer and Vogl. The delight exhibited by the audience in this great work proved that, despite the—we mean, despite Herr Wagner—and all his works, a love for really classical music still exists in the Bavarian capital.—An interesting concert took place in the grand room of the "Museum." Mr. Oberthür, whose reputation as composer and virtuoso is of world-wide dimensions, charmed the select and critical audience by his exquisite harp playing. The endless difficulties of his instrument do not appear to exist for him, his playing is unpretentious, decided, powerful, and artistic in the highest degree. An original trio, for violin, violoncello, and harp, in four movements of composition of great merit, was given to perfection by the members of the Royal Operahouse, Messrs. Lehner, Menter and the author, who, at the conclusion, were twice recalled by the audience. Another, not less interesting performance, was a trio for three harps, also the composition of Mr. Oberthür. It was played by Messrs. Tombo and Zwerger (also belonging to the Royal Operahouse), and the composer. This trio, which introduces the most beautiful effects and combinations possible for harps, was honoured with the same ovation as the former. In both his solo pieces, "Souvenir de Londres" and "Clouds and Sunshine," Mr. Oberthür was repeatedly recalled. Mdlle. Poyet, who has a beautiful mezzo-soprano, and sang with great success in London, some years ago, gave Beethoven's "In questa tomba oscura," "En der herrlichste von allen," by Schumann, and "Nachtstück" by Schubert, with great effect, and was also highly successful in Oberthür's charming romance, "Je voudrais être," in which she was accompanied by the composer on the harp. Last, not least, we must compliment Fraulein Herbeck on her exquisite playing of Liszt's "Ballade," she also played the piano parts in Oberthür's duos for harp and piano on Oberon and Lucrezia Borgia, which met with the most flattering reception, both artists being repeatedly recalled.

BARCELONA.—A musical association, entitled the St. Cecilia Society has been formed, under the presidency of Señor Don Juan Casamitjana, with the purpose of giving concerts for the performance of the best works of Spanish and foreign composers, and otherwise advancing the interests of music.

WAIFS.

Madame Arabella Goddard spent Christmas week with friends in Liverpool and its vicinity.

The Mayfair Minstrels have commenced their meetings for the season, under the direction of Mr. Francesco Berger.

Mdlle. Alvina Valleria, the clever pupil of Signor Arditi, made her début last Saturday at the Scala, Milan, in the part of Isabella in Robert le Diable, with decided success.

Mr. John Francis Barnett's cantatas, The Ancient Mariner and Paradise and the Peri, are in course of rehearsal, and about to be given in public by more than twenty provincial choral societies; a sure proof of popularity.

Misses Blanche Cole and Lucy Franklin, Mr. Nordblom, Mr. Castle, and Mr. Aynsley Cooke, are engaged, by Mr. Gunn, to perform a series of English operas, next month, at the Gaiety Theatre, Dublin. Mr. Liddle is to be the musical director.

Le Menestrel announces that Mdlle. Albani will sustain the part of Ophelia, in M. Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet, at the Royal Italian Opera, next season, and Madame Nilsson that of Mignon, at Mr. Mapleson's Italian Opera, Drury Lane.

The American paper, that stated Signor Arditi's daughter had figured in the orchestra of the New York Academy of Music, is in error. Signor Arditi's daughter as yet numbers but thirteen summers, and has never been out of England where she was born.

The Winter Italian Opera Company at St. George's Hall brought out Mozart's Cosi fan tutte, on Thursday evening, with decided success. The artists exerted themselves to the utmost, and a capital ensemble was attained. The orchestra was perfect. Particulars in our next.

Mr. J. M. Bellew embarked at Liverpool, on Thursday afternoon week, on board the White Star line steamer, Atlantic, for New York. Mr. Bellew has entered into an agreement with Messrs Redpath & Fall, of Boston, to give a series of his popular readings in the United States, commencing at Boston about the 27th of this month. Mr. Bellew will return to Europe in April.

The Liverpool Mercury, in its notice of Mr. Charles Hallé's concert, thus speaks of Mdme. Billinie Porter:—

"Setting an example which might worthily be followed at other first-class concerts in Liverpool, local vocal talent was engaged, and admirably represented by Madame Billinie Porter, whose efforts were as successful as they were highly satisfactory. Meyerbeer's aria 'Va dit elle' was delivered by her with most telling effect, and her excellent voice, careful training, and intelligent taste were clearly shown in her other numbers. In the matter of orchestral accompaniments Madame Porter was highly favoured, the band playing with fine discrimination and a due regard to the vocalist's position."

I have notes—any commentator shall have them for a round, but remarkably reasonable, sum—of many Shakespearian queries. Divers things want clearing up. How about the sack that William lost at Hickley fair? How much a dozen were Mrs. Keech's prawns? What became of Black George Barnes? Who was Master Surrecard, who is alluded to only? Was Master Dumbleton's satin warehouse celebrated? Why did Master Smooth, as a silkman, exhibit the sign of the lubbar's (or leopard's) head? Is there a portrait of Mistress Eleanor Poins? If my friend, Mr. Doran, the new and most fitting Editor of Notes and Queries, can answer me these questions, I will kindly ask him some more.—Punch.

Woman's Rights.—"A woman!—what it is to be a woman! it gives you a right to set every power of hell in motion, and always to be spared the consequences; to upset every arrangement of the world, and disturb the quiet, and put your fingers into every mess, and always to be held blameless. That is your right. Oh, I like those "women's rights!" I should have knocked down the man who had interfered as you have done; but, because you are a woman, I must come out of my quiet, I must derange my life, to save you from your folly. God in heaven! was that what those creatures, those slaves, those toys, were made for? to interfere—for ever to interfere—and to be spared the consequences, at any cost to us?"—Cornhill Magazine.

Fantasio, Offenbach, 3 acts, Opéra-Comique; Le Roi Carotte, opéra-bouffe-féerie, 4 acts, Gaieté; Une Fête à Venise, opéra-bouffe, F. Ricci, 4 acts, Athénée; Le Docteur Rose, idem, 3 acts, Bouffes-Parisiens; Le Vengeur, opéra-bouffe, Legouix, Variétiés; Les 400 Femmes d'Ali Baba, Nibelle, Folies-Marigny; Les Brioches du doge, Demarquette, Folies-Bergères; Le Passant, one-act, Paladilhe, Opéra-Comique; Sylvana, de Weber, 4 acts, Athénée; La Timballe d'Argent, 3 acts, Léon Vasseur, Bouffes-Parisiens; Djamileh, one-act, Georges Bizet, Opéra-Comique; Les Cent Vierges, Charles Lecoq, Variétiés; La Princesse Jaune, one-act, Camille Saint-Saëns, Opéra-Comique; L'Alibi, 3 acts, Nibelle, Athénée; Dimanche et Lundi, one-act, Delandres, idem; Héloise et Abélard, idem, Henry Litolff, Folies-Dramatiques; Don César de Bazan, opera-comique, 3 acts, Massanet, Opéra-Comique; Mdme. Turlupin, opéra-comique, 2 acts, Guiraud, Athénée.

We understand that an effort is being made to hold a musical festival at Liverpool similar to that held at Norwich and other places. Many years ago musical gatherings of this description were held periodically, and resulted in adding a large amount to the funds of the local charities. The last of these festivals took place in October, 1836, when £2300 were realised, and appropriated to purposes of benevolence. Several meetings have been held at the town hall, at which the proposal was discussed, and it is probable that a requisition will be presented to the mayor asking him to convene a public meeting on the subject. Should the decision be favourable, action will be taken for giving effect to the suggestion, for holding a festival about September next, the surplus funds to go towards aiding the medical charities. Of late a more decided taste for high-class music has characterised our townsmen, and this, taken in connection with the increased population since festivals were held, justifies a hope that the project would be eminently successful.

L'Art Musical gives the following as a list of those eminent in connection with music who have died during 1872:—

"Carafa, Léopold Amat, Théophile Gautier, Michel Carré, Nérée Desarbres, librettistes; S. Dufour, directeur de la Revue et Gazette de Paris; Charles Battaille, Ch. Duvernoy, Guérin, Tariot, professeurs titulaires et honoraires du Conservatoire; Eugène Ferrand, secrétaire de cet établissement; Leylon, professeur de chant dans les écoles de la Ville; les ténors Renard et Colin; le baryton Gassier; les cantatrices Sabine Heinefetter, Pisaroni, Carlotta Marchisio, Benita Moreno, Julia Priedo; Lafeuillade, Théodore Cogniard, De Chilly, Raphael Félix, directeurs de théâtres; les chefs d'orchestre Eugène Prévost, Auguste Mey; Alexis Colleuille, régisseur de l'Opéra; les maîtres de chapelle et organistes V. Renaud, Ch. Simonin (de Dinand), Charbonnier (d'Aix), Gaspard Michel, maître tambourinïste au Conservatoire d'Aix; les critiques et musicologues Théodore Hagen (États-Unis), Chorley (de Londres), Dr. Coremans (de Bruxelles), les maestri Alessandro Gandini, Alessandro Ghislanzoni (Venise), N. Manzaros, auteur de l'hymne national grec; Georges Galitzin; Francesco Lucca, éditeur à Milan; Georges Hasselmans, harpiste; Kessler, le célèbre pianiste autrichien; Luigi Anglois, contre-bassiste; les acteurs Arnal et Kopp," &c.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING

Price 12s.

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine, (Longman & Co.,) they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from, Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country. The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION.

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country. The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

"ST. PATRICK AT TARA."

CANTATA.

By PROFESSOR GLOVER.

Dedicated by permission to

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ARTHUR PATRICK.

Price 3s.; bound in cloth, gilt, 5s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"The publication of Professor Glover's Cantata, 'St. Patrick at Tara,' will be gladly welcomed by choral societies, requiring a work of moderate difficulty but extensive interest. The subject, essentially national in character, is, moreover, one that could scarcely fail to awaken the attention of most people, but more especially Irishmen, who will doubtless see that the spirit of the ancient bards has not entirely passed away from the more prosaic times. For freedom of melodic treatment and characteristic harmony Mr. Glover's Cantata deserves to be widely known. There is a special interest attached to the work, inasmuch as H.R.H. Prince Arthur Patrick has been pleased to accept the dedication of a theme which treats of a period of ever-living interest."—Morning Post.

"This cantata, it may be remembered, was performed at St. George's Hall last year, and was remarkably well received. It has now been published in a convenient and elegant volume, uniform with Professor Glover's edition of Moore's "Irish Melodies." The theme of the cantata is the introduction of Christianity into Ireland, and the poetical selections set to music are taken from the works of Ossian, Moore, Clarence Mangan, and other poets. The peculiar and distinguishing characteristics of the composition consist in the intermingling of music of a national with music of a sacred description, which produces a striking and not unpleasing effect. There are several pretty melodies in this cantata, among which a contralto solo, "I often wish," and a bass song, "Lord have mercy upon me," stand out conspicuously. As the execution of "St. Patrick at Tara" does not present any formidable difficulties, we should say it is likely to become a favourite with amateur choral societies, as well as with their audiences."—The Echo.

LA FEMME DE CLAUDE.

(Extract from a Letter.)

Paris, Jan. 18.

M. Alexandre Dumas, the younger, has succeeded in persuading the Parisians to swallow such a quantity of trash, that he thinks he is at liberty to play any tricks he may please. There seems reason to believe, however, that he has now reached the length of his tether, and that the theatrical world of Paris has at length said to the author of La Dame aux Camélias, "thus far shalt thou go, and no further." There can hardly be a doubt that had La Femme de Claude been played by second-rate actors, and the principal part been given to an artist who is considered by good judges to be the best actress in Paris, the piece would have been an ignominious failure.

There is great wit, little action, and a surprising amount of sermonizing in M. Dumas' new piece, but nought else. It is said that the author means to preach a sermon on the results of vicious conduct. Unfortunately the Parisians know very well that there are a vast number of rich rascals in Paris, who, in spite of rascality, are contented with their lot in life, whilst there are many honest men in sad straits.

The author of the Femme de Claude is troubled with a theory, and it is this theory which has stood in his way. He thinks that under certain circumstances an injured husband is not only justified in killing his sinful wife, but that it is the duty of every honest man to rid the world of such a disgrace to her sex.

Claude Ripper is an inventor, living in a remote country. When the curtain rises Claude has just succeeded in inventing a cannon, which is to throw a projectile capable of destroying whole regiments at once. But if Claude is successful in discovering new means of destroying human life, he is not equally fortunate in domestic affairs. His wife, Césarine (Mdlle. Desclée), has gone to the bad. Perhaps Claude paid too much attention to his muskets and too little to his wife, or was too good for her, and, like Guinevere, she "half despised the height to which she would not, or she could not climb."

But, in any case, she has ceased to love him. Claude will not separate from her, because he says she is still kept under restraint by the fact of possessing, in name at all events, a husband. At the time when the play begins, Césarine has just returned from a journey, and declares to her femme de chambre that, after long being unfaithful to him, she has returned because she is in love with her own husband—perhaps, as she cynically remarks, because so virtuous a passion is quite a new sensation. If Césarine cares for her husband, however, her husband cares very little for her; and, in the first scene, we find him quietly remarking to his pupil, Antonin, that he is aware the latter is in love with his wife, and warning him of the dangers of the love of Césarine. Just as Claude has finished sermon number one—a tirade on the woes of France, and the duty of neglecting even one's wife for one's country's sake—there appears a character who is to play an important part. This is the lawyer Cantagnac, a Marseillese adventurer, the secret agent of an association which makes it a business to buy, borrow, or steal, all promising inventions. This man has attempted to obtain possession of Claude's secret, but, so far, failed. The inventor—who, like most of his class, is hard pressed for money—is about to sell his paternal estate in order to raise the funds of which he is in need. Cantagnac offers to advance Claude whatever he may require, on condition that the inventor guarantees him a fourth of his profits. "They"—the Prussians, though Dumas does not say so—"have killed his son," and the bereaved Cantagnac seeks revenge by aiding the man who has invented a cannon which will ensure the easy triumph of France over her enemies. But Claude is inflexible. So Cantagnac, unsuccessful with the husband, determines to gain his ends by means of the wife, whom he has in his power. In an interview with Césarine, he tells her the history of her past life; how she had a child before marriage, whose birth she had endeavoured to conceal. "Now," says Cantagnac, "you must sell me your husband's secret, or I tell him all." "He knows it," replies Césarine, "send for him and tell him." But the spy has yet a more terrible weapon in his possession. "Come, come, madam, let us have no more trifling. The association, of which I am an agent, employed M. Richard to worm your husband's secret from you. He was fool enough to fall in love with you, and you have passed the last few months in his company. You have suppressed all traces of your amour in a way you believe to be effective, and M. Richard has disappeared. But you have committed at least one crime against the laws of France, and if you refuse to do my bidding I will hand you over to the public prosecutor. Césarine is frightened. She asks for time to reflect, and the lawyer leaves her, sure of his victim. Left alone, the wretched woman sees but one chance of escape—to win her husband's love, and trust to his honourable name to protect her against the attacks of Cantagnac. At the commencement of the second act we are introduced to a most extraordinary personage. This is a Jewish gentleman rejoicing in the name of Daniel, for some unexplained reason dressed like a French notary, or an English clergyman, in solemn black and white tie. This mysterious gentleman announced his attention of going on a voyage to search for the lost tribe. He then treated us to sermon No. 2. which was so wearisome, and incomprehensible that the audience yawned. The Hebrew's daughter Rebecca, however, charmingly personated by Mdlle. Pierson, declares, before her father starts, that she will accompany him because she is in love with Claude! She cannot be his wife here below—but la haut; and she points to the ceiling. The latter, who had had enough of matrimony to discourage him from taking a fresh partner, declaring that he returns Miss Rebecca's sentiments, she leaves him. All this has gone on in the hearing of Césarine, who, stung to madness by her husband's threatened infidelity, tells Antonin, Claude's weak-minded pupil, that she loves him, and Claude that she must speak to him alone.

Then follows one of the best scenes in the play, although one of which the success was as much to be attributed to the acting of Mdlle. Desclée as to the skill of M. Dumas. The wife makes a last attempt to regain her place in her husband's affections. She endeavours, but in vain, in a scene—to see Mdlle. Desclée play which it is alone worth going many a mile—to convince Claude of the sincerity of her repentance. At last Claude cuts the matter short by telling her that there is no place for love of her in his heart—"La place est prise." Driven to madness by this insult, Césarine vows that if she must fall she will not fall alone. Claude retorts that if she hurts others he will kill her. Césarine flings herself into the arms of Antonin, whom she is anxious to seduce, in order that she may obtain Claude's secret, and, by selling it to Cantagnac, save herself from disgrace.

In the third act the audience has to undergo sermon No. 3, delivered by Claude, in a soliloquy, which was little to the taste of the audience. "Shall he kill his wife?" is the question. In the worst taste Claude is made to ask the Most High for a sign which shall confirm him in his resolve. The appearance of Cantagnac cuts short the soliloquy; but a dialogue follows so cynical, blasphemous, and silly, that the audience cried shame, and were with difficulty persuaded to hear it to the end. No sooner has Cantagnac departed than Edmée, Césarine's femme de chambre, appears on the scene, and tells Claude how his wife is determined, by the aid of her lover Antonin, to steal his secret and deliver it up to Cantagnac. Claude listens, pardons Edmée, and goes quietly off to the station, to see the last of his beloved Rebecca. He returns just in time to find Césarine struggling with her lover for possession of the MS. which contains the secret. Shrieking out "Voleuse!" he catches up a musket of Antonin's invention, and stretches his wife dead at his feet. Antonin looks as if he expected to receive the contents of the remaining barrel, but no—Claude takes his wife's paramour by the shoulder, says, "Come to work," and the curtain falls.

A more illogical work than the Femme de Claude has rarely been set on the stage. Some months ago M. Dumas, in his pamphlet L'Homme-Femme, told us that when women were utterly vicious they ought to be killed; and it is evident that he is pleading for this theory in his new play. But more astonishing than the monstrosity of his theory are the arguments by which he endeavours to persuade the public to accept his views. It would have been easy to imagine a woman so abandoned that an outraged husband could have been pitied for slaying her in a moment of ungovernable passion. But so simple a plot would not do for M. Dumas, or rather one might fancy that his courage failed him. After painting Césarine at the beginning as a prodigy of wickedness—unchaste before marriage, and an adulteress, if not murderess, after it—he contrives to excite one's sympathy for the wretched woman, her last crime, for which she perishes, being hardly voluntary. She was an instrument, helpless in the hands of Cantagnac, who could disgrace her for life by a word, and send her to the hulks. And even when so driven to desperation Césarine makes one last effort to escape without betraying her husband. In return for her proffered love, what does Claude tell her? That he must have time to see proofs of her sincerity? He loves another. Such an insult might have driven a better wife than Césarine to madness, and henceforward she has no choice. She must betray her husband, who hates her, and whom she hates, or be tried for her life. It is not wonderful that she does not hesitate. And yet it is not for adultery, but for stealing, that Claude's wife is shot. It was hardly worth while to write a play in order to prove that you have a right to shoot any one who runs away with the contents of your safe.

These are only two of the principal contradictions in the play, which is open to criticism in other points. As to the Jew, Daniel, no one seemed able to understand whence he came or whither he went, and he is inexplicable. Cantagnac, the sham notary, is a copy of a very old "type." Rodin, the Jesuit, in Eugene Sue's Juif Errant, has been the father of a tribe of rascals, supposed to be full of the knowledge and cunning which popular prejudice ascribes to the British detective. Claude, the hero, is impossible and untrue to reality. Mdlle. Desclée is so accustomed to success since her "creation" of Frou-Frou, that her admirable acting, though highly applauded, was not so appreciated as it would have been if displayed by an artist of less pre-eminent merit. In the scene with Claude, when Césarine plays her last card, and endeavours to win back her husband's love, Mdlle. Desclée surpassed all her previous efforts. It would have been easy to tear the passion to pieces, but Mdlle. Desclée kept within just bounds in a manner which, had she no other title to fame, would stamp her as one of the first actresses on the French stage.

M. Landrol does his best in the character of Claude; and M. Bradeau is an amusing though honest-looking villain; and Mdlle. Pierson, in spite of her forty summers, looks so innocent that one expects to hear of her being a candidate for a rosière.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

A performance of Schumann's pianoforte quartet, on Monday evening, gave amateurs another opportunity of estimating a remarkable and much debated genius. Like the quintet played not long ago, the quartet belongs to the middle portion of Schumann's career; resembling that work, also, in having the same key (E flat), and in being the only example of its kind produced by the author. To fully appreciate the significance of this composition, as of all others referable to the same period—the pianoforte concerto, three string quartets (Op. 41), &c.—it is needful to remember that Schumann, equally with Beethoven, had his "trois styles," though they were not, perhaps, of a character to rouse another M. de Lens to rhapsody. The first and third divisions of this tripartite career should be looked upon more with regard to the light they throw upon the second, than with reference to any special value of their own. Schumann himself spoke of his early years as a "storm period," and he might have added that the storm left marks upon him which nothing could efface. Youth is always revolutionary, most so as respects matters it least understands; and Schumann, who threw himself into music with the energy of a fervent poetic temperament, thought of nothing less than revolutionizing an art to which, save in the matter of its poetry, he was nearly a stranger. The time that should have been spent in severe self-discipline, and in the acquisition of that technical knowledge which such natures as his are ever ready to undervalue, was devoted to a Quixotic campaign against the "tyranny of form" and the "despotism of the tone-family." He saw Music as a fair maiden, bound hand and foot, and gagged, and he set lance in rest to do his devoir on her behalf. It is easy to sympathise with this enthusiasm for a condition of art as free as man's thought, and as plastic as his emotional nature; but it is inevitable to regret, knowing what we now know of Schumann, that an unquestionable genius was permitted thus to run wild. The time came when soberer ideas prevailed, when the mirage of youth faded, and Schumann saw an arduous and weary travel between him and his goal. To the honour of the man let us say that he faced his task with characteristic earnestness, and gallantly strove to redeem the past. But self-discipline at thirty is difficult; and by taking no amount of thought could Schumann make up for precious time lost in the pursuit of phantoms. There were two storm-periods in the life of this master, the second being hardly less significant than the first. The sun of his genius rose amid fantastic mists, never wholly dispelled; but it set amid clouds and darkness. No story in the tragic annals of earth's gifted sons is more melancholy than that of Schumann, from the time when disease manifested itself till it ended in hallucination and madness. That he laboured while daylight remained to him, his Manfred, Genoveva, and Faust, are enough to prove; but these works have, in our view, a sad significance, and lead us to ask how far their predecessors may have been affected by the peculiar mental and physical condition which culminated thus. Looking at the middle period of Schumann's artistic career in the light thrown upon it from the immediate past and immediate future, much is explained—as, for example, distinctive personality, excessive idealism, a vagueness of expression, and an obvious want of self-control. But, to estimate Schumann aright, it must not be forgotten that these things sprang more from the accident of circumstances and constitution than from any deficiency of genius. Indeed, only a great genius could compel respect and admiration in the face of such adverse conditions. A critic may not admire Schumann, as represented, say, by the quartet performed on Monday, but it is impossible to despise him. Like the Wedding Guest in Coleridge's poem, one "cannot choose but hear" his music, however much the "loud bassoon" of more orthodox composers may be playing more orthodox strains elsewhere. In what lies this attractive force? Partly, as we venture to think, in an earnest enthusiasm which never fails to interest those who come in contact with it; partly, in the poetic expression of feelings which, intense in Schumann's case, are shared by humanity at large. Schumann was no mere mechanic who made a trade of his art. He had something to say—something which welled up from the depths of his nature; and he said it with a passionate fervour and an imaginative power that, spite of drawbacks, will preserve for his memory, through all time to come, "a broad approach of fame, and ever-ringing avenues of song." With regard to the pianoforte quartet, which has often been a theme of comment, we need only add that it aptly illustrates the remarks its performance has suggested. Unqualified approval of all the work contains will not be demanded by its composer's most ardent admirer; who, however, need not trouble to exact the homage due to a work of genius. Such homage is freely given, and will continue to be given as long as human sympathies are instinctively excited by the outpourings of a highly-gifted soul. The work received entire justice at the hands of Madame Norman-Néruda, Herr Straus (viola), Signor Piatti, and Herr Dannreuther (piano), its performance being one which will take no mean place in the season's records.

We must use another opportunity of noticing, as it deserves, Haydn's very charming Quartet in B flat (Op. 33), which was played for the first time at these concerts, and made a lively impression. Herr Dannreuther's performance of Beethoven's Sonata in F minor ("Appassionata") excited much enthusiasm, the brilliant and difficult finale being executed with especial vigour, while the whole reading was that of a scholar and an artist. A more favourable début at these concerts we do not often have to record. Signor Piatti played Marcello's Sonata in G with his usual exquisite finish, and had to repeat the last two movements. Equally good in its way was Sir Julius Benedict's pianoforte accompaniment, which, never obtrusive, and distinguished by skill as perfect as its taste, set off the solo to great advantage. Sir Julius has often been called the "prince of accompanists;" let us raise him higher, and hail him the emperor of that ilk. Mr. Sims Reeves, who had a very warm reception, sang "In native worth," and with more acceptance, because of their less hackneyed beauty, Mariani's "Una rosa in cemitero" and Mendelssohn's "Hunter's Song." These were given in Mr. Reeves' best style, and the "Hunter's song" was warmly encored.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

The second and last morning concert took place in St. James's Hall on the 11th inst., and attracted a very large audience, who had good reason for satisfaction with that which was set before them. Old ballads took up more than their usual share of the programme; and thus did Mr. Boosey reply to a favourite criticism upon his enterprise—a criticism charging him with subordinating the question of merit to a question of trade profit. For ourselves, we have no sympathy with any objection of the kind, in view of actual facts. It is beyond contradiction that Mr. Boosey has presented many good modern ballads, and a host of those which are good and old, under conditions the most favourable as regards performance. If, at the same time, he has enticed to Holles Street customers galore, so much the better for him, and we are glad of it. Among the well-known items of the programme under notice were Dussek's "Name the glad day," well sung by Miss Banks; "The Lass of Richmond Hill," and "Fair Hebe I left," for both of which Mr. Santley did all that was possible; "The harp that once through Tara's Halls," and "Robin Adair," charmingly delivered by Miss Edith Wynne; "The Last Rose of Summer," which Mr. Sims Reeves was obliged to repeat; "She wore a wreath of roses," entrusted to the safe hands of Mdme. Patey; and Purcell's "What shall I do to show how much I love her?"—the excellent choice of Mr. Nordblom. All these were received with immense favour, and certainly formed a bouquet of old songs not very easy to match. The novelties commanded equal favour: Mdme. Patey obtaining an easy encore for Scott Gatty's "Unspoken"—a song which she cannot fail to make popular; Mr. Reeves being recalled after Molloy's "Dreams;" and Mr. Santley being compelled to repeat the last verse of Hatton's "British Tar"—the vigorous music of which he gave with splendid effect. The words by Mr. J. V. Bridgeman could hardly fail to inspire Mr. Hatton with some of his best ideas, so much of the true ring of patriotic poetry have they about them. Another success was achieved by Miss Wynne in Molloy's "So the story goes," a piquant and attractive song which will soon be heard everywhere. The Orpheus Quartet Union again contributed some concerted pieces, and Mdlle. del Bianca played two pianoforte solos with good effect.

On Wednesday took place the first of eight evening concerts, the artists being those named above. Again there was a large audience, and many successes, a few of which we must specify. Miss Banks led off by winning an encore for "The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington;" and other encores were gained by Mr. Santley for Sullivan's "A life that lives for you;" by Mdme. Patey for "Unspoken;" by Mr. Santley for "The King and I;" by Mr. Sims Reeves for a new song, "The Sun-dial" (Roeckel); by Mr. Santley for Hatton's "British Tar;" by Miss Wynne for "So the story goes;" and by Mr. Reeves for an exquisite delivery of the "Pilgrim of Love." These details are enough to show what a successful concert took place, and in what degree the audience enjoyed themselves.

ST. GEORGE'S OPERA.

Excellent as have been, for the most part, the performances of Il Conte Ory, Il Barbiere di Siviglia, and L'Elisir d'Amore, the performance of Mozart's Così fan tutte puts them all into the shade. It says no little for the directors of the Italian Company at St. George's Hall that they should have had the courage to bring forward this true model of operatic music, so unjustly neglected by our great houses in Covent Garden and Drury Lane. Così fan tutte was written in January 1790, and its gifted author died in December 1791. The book was by Lorenzo da Ponte, the same who adapted Le Nozze di Figaro from the celebrated comedy of Beaumarchais, in 1786, and prepared the libretto for Don Giovanni in the following year. So that Così fan tutte was given to the world in the zenith of Mozart's powers—the year previous to Die Zauberflöte, La Clemenza di Tito, and the Requiem—before he had entirely filled up and completed the last of which he died.

To enter into a detailed analysis of a work which for more than eighty years has been accepted as a masterpiece would be superfluous. All musicians, and, indeed, all cultivated amateurs, are familiar with the beauties of Così fan tutte, and need not be reminded of them one by one. The music of this work stands neither in want of a fresh history nor of the process which a conventional phrase of recent years describes as "whitewashing." On the other hand, no amount of "whitewashing" could be of any material use to the libretto, one of the worst Da Ponte is known to have concocted. Fiordiligi and Dorabella, two Neapolitan sisters, are respectively in love with, and loved by, Ferrando and Guglielmo, young officers, whose belief in the stedfast affection of their betrothed is of such a nature that no argument can possibly weaken it. Nevertheless, they are persuaded by an intimate friend, Don Alphonso, who pretends to be a philosopher and has no faith in human constancy, especially where the gentler sex is concerned, to agree to a stratagem by which the good faith of Fiordiligi and Dorabella may be put to the test. Alphonso thereupon informs them that their enamoured suitors are suddenly called away to military duty—so suddenly as scarcely to allow time for the briefest possible farewell. After the departure of Ferrando and Guglielmo, Fiordiligi and Dorabella are in the deepest distress; when Alphonso, through the influence of a bribe, induces Despina, their confidential maid—who, to judge by her one soliloquy, "In uomini in soldati," entertains as supreme a contempt for men (soldiers particularly) as Alphonso professes to entertain for women—to introduce to her mistresses a couple of unknown gentleman. These gentlemen are no other than Ferrando and Guglielmo, who, disguised as Albanian chiefs, so as to utterly deceive the ladies, at once pay court to them, and, though repulsed at first, in the end gain their point through the clumsy pretence of having in despair swallowed poison. From the naturally anticipated results they are thought to be rescued by Despina. This cunning accomplice of Alphonso, by the practice of animal magnetism, is supposed to neutralize the effects of the drugs they have feigned to swallow, and restore them to health. Unable to resist such an extraordinary proof of devoted love, the two ladies are vanquished The marriage contracts are about to be signed, when, under some pretext, the Albanian chiefs withdraw, and shortly afterwards Ferrando and Guglielmo re-appear in their ordinary attire. Their military expedition having been less important than was expected, they had come back with rapture to their beloved mistresses. The divulgement of the stratagem invented by Don Alphonso, added to a short explanation, neither logical nor moral, from that exemplary gentleman, brings about a reconciliation, the couples on either hand being satisfied; and, with an edifying "tag," allotted to the whole of the dramatis personæ, accompanied by the chorus—in which we are told that the man is happy who takes everything that comes without grumbling, and allows reason to guide him—the curtain descends. This reminds us of "Tout est pour le mieux dans ce meilleur des mondes possible" of Voltaire's Candide—with deference, be it understood, to the wittiest of all Frenchmen.

We have given the foregoing particulars because the opera of Così fan tutte is now so rarely heard that the dramatic plot upon which it is built has in all probability been forgotten by nine amateurs out of ten. But the exquisitely melodious, graceful, and expressive music of Mozart, who on so many occasions triumphantly proved that he could turn dross into gold, needs no such detailed description, inasmuch as it has long been admitted as classic. Who, for example, does not know and admire the lively and symmetrical overture (a worthy counterpart of that to Figaro); the two ingeniously constructed, artfully woven, and thoroughly dramatic finales, brimful of spontaneous tune; the masterly sestet, "Alla bella Despinetta;" the charming little trios, "La mia Dorabella," and "Una bella serenata;" the admirably constructed quintet, "Sento e Dio, che questo piede;" the terzetto in E, "Soave sia il vento;" the tenor air for Ferrando, "Un' aura amorosa;" and, not to tire our readers by extending the catalogue, some half dozen more pieces, solo or concerted? Happily the majority of these have been made familiar and popular through channels independent of the theatre. In a word, Così fan tutte (called Weibertrue in the German version) contains some of the most beautiful and finished music that ever came from the pen of Mozart, which is equivalent to saying some of the most beautiful and finished music ever written. The first act, without hyperbole, may be likened to a "string of pearls;" the second flags here and there—not through any shortcomings of the composer, but through the defective construction of the piece. As Mozart was compelled to set Le Nozze di Figaro to music by his somewhat niggardly patron and master, Joseph II. of Austria (brother of Maria Antoinette), so he was compelled by necessity to set Così fan tutte, the libretto of which he would otherwise hardly have been induced to accept.

As we have already hinted, the performance generally was excellent. The characters of Fiordiligi and Dorabella were both well represented, the one by Mdlle. Risarelli, the other by Mdme. Danielli. Each lady sang her music with taste and correctness. Mdlle. Risarelli, of whose qualifications as a dramatic vocalist we have spoken more than once, created a marked impression by her spirited delivery of the air, "Come scoglio immoto resta," when Fiordiligi energetically repulses the advances of Ferrando, who, disguised in his Albanian costume, she of course does not recognize. The less important, though by no means unimportant, character of Despina showed Mdlle. Viscontini in a favourable light, both as actress and singer. Signor Rinaldini, as Ferrando, sang better than we can remember to have heard him sing before till now—especially in the graceful and melodious "Un' aura amorosa," and Signor Mottino was perhaps more completely suited in the part of Guglielmo than in any other we have seen him play. Don Alphonso, the old woman-hater, found a competent representative in Signor Rocca. Signor Fiori, conductor, and M. Pollitzer, leading violin, deserve high credit for the almost perfect manner in which the ingenious and beautiful orchestral accompaniments were played throughout; and it is no more than strict truth to say that Così fan tutte, as thus given, is well worth a visit to St. George's Hall.

The new company have also produced the much more familiar opera, L'Elisir d'Amore, of which it will suffice to say that the chief characters are represented with commendable efficiency by Mdme. Danielli (Adina), Signor Rinaldini, from Her Majesty's Opera (Nemorino), Signor Mottino (Belcore), Mdlle. Maccagno (Gianetta), and last and perhaps best, Signor Topai (Dulcamara), who imparts all the necessary unctuousness to the erratic compounder and dispenser of infallible nostrums, without the slightest exhibition of buffoonery.

HAMBURGH.—The 209th Philharmonic Concert was given in the large room of the Concert Garden. The programme included Symphony in E flat, Haydn; music to the ballet, Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus (first and second act), Beethoven; and third Symphony in A, Op. 56, Anton Rubinstein.

POTSDAM.—Herr Franz Ries took part in the last concert given by the Philharmonic Society. He played, among other things, his own Op. 19, a Notturno, and a Saltarello.

Time for Music.

LONG YEARS AGO.

(Copyright.)

Long years ago my love and I
Went hand in hand together;
The roses lay about our path,
'Twas always summer weather.
No thought had we of time or change,
No dread of future grieving;
Life's winged hours flew gaily past,
A treasured mem'ry leaving.

My love has vanished from my side,
And now I wander lonely;
The sky is darken'd overhead,
My feet press dead leaves only.
No hope remains for coming years,
And reckless of the morrow,
From day to day I ceaseless bear
The burden of my sorrow.

But near the heart that ever grieves,
May still be found my treasure;
There blooms she in a changeless youth,
And smiles on me with pleasure.
So will she smile when at the gate
Of Heaven's eternal dwelling,
I join her, never more to part,
My breast with rapture swelling.

LUCCA IN GERMAN OPERA.

(From "Watson's New York Art Journal.")

The regular season having closed, two extra nights have been given this week. On Wednesday, Lucca appeared as Mrs. Ford, in Nicolai's charming comic opera, The Merry Wives of Windsor. The music of this opera is full of genuine traits of beauty—its concerted music especially. It is full of melody, very characteristic, and is redolent of fun and esprit. We listened to it throughout with great pleasure.

Lucca in this opera can hardly be criticised; there is not a point, from the beginning to the end, that we could wish to have altered. In the first place, she looked the part, and was beautiful. We might allude to some anachronisms in the costume; but as Shakespeare was not particular as regards his dates or his localities, and as the German operatic view of the play is, to say the least, peculiar, we can afford to give large license in other particulars.

Her personation of the character was truly inimitable, not only in breadth of conception, but in the thousand details which the situations demand. Her scenes with her husband when she assumes the air of injured innocence, her bursts of virtuous indignation, succeeded by tears and sobbing, were as natural as life itself, and gave a vitality to the character, which it has never received from other hands. She sang the music also admirably, sustaining its florid character with brilliant ease, with such dash and such indomitable spirit that we do not care to be critically exigent. Taking it all in all, we think that Lucca's impersonation of Mrs. Ford was the greatest artistic success she has yet achieved. It brought into play all the most brilliant points of her nature, so that her interpretation of the character was perfectly spontaneous. Her success was great; all the points she made were acknowledged; and she had the audience with her from the first scene to the last.

We should have been permitted to witness this truly admirable performance once again, for the more we reflect upon it the more we feel that it is one of the finest examples of musical melody that we have ever seen. If the proverb, "Extremes meet," was ever verified, it is in the case of Lucca; for, while she soars to grandeur in the expression of the intensely emotional, she rises to perfection in the comedy of every-day life. Such extremes are exceptional, and are the attributes of unquestionable genius.

MILAN.—Roberto il Diavolo was produced at the Scala on the 12th ult. What it must have cost the management to get up, no one but the management knows. Three ladies accepted in succession the part of Alice, and not one, thanks to colds, coughs, rheumatism, neuralgia, and so on, could appear; and a fourth lady, Signora Krauss, had to be engaged. "It is an ill wind that blows nobody good," the proverb tells us, and the indisposition of her three fair sisters in art afforded Signora Krauss a fine opportunity, of which she fully availed herself. She certainly was the great feature of the evening. Signor Bulterini was a satisfactory Roberto. In Signor Maini, Bertramo found an effective representative vocally, but a bad one dramatically, speaking. Signora Valleria was not especially satisfactory as the Princess. The orchestra, under the direction of Signor Faccio, especially distinguished itself; the same is true of the chorus. The ballet might have been better. Altogether, however, the performance may be regarded as a success. With Roberto, and Signor Pallerini's ballet, Le due Gemelle, music by Signor Ponchielli, the management reckon on not having to change the bill before the production of Signor Gomes's Fosca.—Crispino e la Comare has been very successfully produced at the Teatro Carcano.

BERLIN.—At the invitation of the Association for producing the "Stage-Festival-Play," Der Ring der Nibelungen, by Herr R. Wagner, a large number of ladies and gentlemen attended a meeting held a short time since in Arnim's Rooms. Herr W. Tappert, the secretary, read a report on the object of the Association. From this report it appears that this object is not merely the production of Der Ring der Nibelungen at Bayreuth, but its performance at Berlin also, in a theatre erected especially for the purpose. Subscription lists were ready to hand, and several new members signed them. Every member has to pay one thaler entrance money, and an annual subscription of four thalers. Until the success of the Bayreuth scheme is assured, one half of the capital of the Association is to be devoted to the purchase of patrons' tickets (Patronatsscheine), which will be raffled for by the members; the other half will be put out at interest for the projected performance here, as will, also, the entire capital of the Association, [illegible]ediately the Bayreuth scheme is safe. The crowded state of the [illegible]roved very plainly that in Berlin, as elsewhere, Herr Wagner can a large number of partisans.

THE OBITUARY OF 1872.

The following is a list of persons, more or less eminent in connection with music, who died during the past year:—

"Signor Gandini, an operatic composer, at Modena; Signor Gassier, a celebrated baritone operatic singer; Madame Julia Priedo, a Spanish singer; M. Colin, a tenor singer, the original Faust in Gounod's opera; M. David de Vries, a Belgian tenor; Herr Kessler, pianist and composer, at Vienna; Herr Tschersech, a composer, at Berlin; Mr. H. F. Chorley, musical writer and critic; M. Aime Maillart, a French composer; Herr Joseph Schott, a bass singer, at Hanover; Herr Kaufmann, the inventor of many ingenious musical machines and instruments; Signor Torriani, a writer on vocal music, at Milan; Senora Moreno, long ago a celebrated prima donna; M. van Boom, of Stockholm; Herr Hahn, a composer and pianist, once an intimate friend of Beethoven; Signor Giulio Regondi, the celebrated guitarist; M. Battailie, French vocalist; M. Renard, a French vocalist; M. Anglois, a famous double-bass player; Herr Heinrich Esser, a celebrated composer, at Salzburg; Herr Ulrich, a composer, at Berlin; M. Enjalbert, an organist, at Paris; M. Renand, musical director, at Paris; Dr. G. F. Flowers, a learned musical writer and composer; M Guerni, a violinist, at Paris; Herr E. Tod, organist, at Stuttgart; M. Moniuszko, a composer of excellence, at Warsaw; Miss Eyles, a popular singer; Carlotta Marchesio, a celebrated singer, at Paris; Baron Nass, a violinist, at Dresden; Ludwig Hetsch, music director, at Mannheim; Michael Carafa, a very celebrated opera composer, at Paris; Herr Weiprecht, bandmaster, at Berlin; Mr. Henry Drayton, a popular singer, at New York; Signor Giannetto, an opera composer; Mr. Thomas Young, an alto singer, at London; M. Eugene Prevost, a French opera composer; Caroline Siedler, a celebrated vocalist who sang in the first performance of Der Freischütz; Herr Schulz-Weida, a pianoforte composer, at Brunswick; M. C. Simonen, a celebrated French organist; Dr. Lowell Mason, an American hymn-tune writer; Prince Galitzen, a Russian amateur composer; Herr Kœnig, a celebrated horn player; Dr. F. Robinson, vicar-choral of St. Patrick's, Dublin; Signor Ciabatta, a baritone singer of merit; Signor Lucca, music-publisher, at Milan; Madame Marquet, one of the once celebrated sisters Heinefetter; Signor Mercantani, an Italian composer; M. C. Duvernoy, formerly one of the professors at the Paris Conservatoire; Mr. O. Bradbury, many years a vicar-choral at Westminster Abbey; Mr. Henry Blagrove, one of the ablest of English violinists; Mr. E. T. Jones, organist of Canterbury Cathedral; Signor Tadolini, an opera composer, at Bologna; and Herr Badar, Beethoven's pianoforte tuner."

VIENNA.—After being allowed to slumber for almost, if not quite, as long a period as the Sleeping Beauty in the Wood, Gluck's Armida has been revived at the Imperial Operahouse, and restored to its place among the stock-pieces of that establishment. It is just a century since it was composed, and since it triumphed at Paris over Duni, Philador, and Monsigny, over Remeau and Lulli, besides effectually putting an extinguisher on the previously popular Piccini. Everyone engaged on the present occasion strove to do his or her best towards making the revival a success. First comes Mdme. Dustmann, who sustained the part of the heroine in a manner fully justifying the loud and frequent applause bestowed upon her. Mr. Adams was zealous and correct as Rinaldo. The characters of Ubald, Hidroat, and Artemidor, found efficient representatives in Herren Bignio, Kraus, and Müller, respectively; Mdme. Materna was the Fury of Hate, and Mdlle. Siegstadt, the demon of the same objectionable passion. The chorus was efficient; so was the orchestra; the costumes were rich and in good taste, and the new scenery reflects credit on Herr Brioschi.

REGENSBURG.—A Professor Hofmann, a native of Wurtemberg, has been giving four lectures upon Herr R. Wagner's Niebelungen Trilogy. They were very poorly attended.—The Oratorio Association gave a very good performance, on the 4th inst., of Haydn's Creation, under the direction of Count Du Moulin. This gentleman intends, shortly, getting up a performance of compositions by Herr R. Wagner, whose works are at present totally unknown here. Poor Regensburghians! Will no one whisper in the Count's ear a translation of the line: "Where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise?" Herr and Madame Vogl, the Wagnerian singers from Munich, are to be the principal vocalists on the occasion.

BONN.—A fresh laurel wreath was laid on Robert Schumann's tomb on the 6th inst. It was sent from the Dresden Singing Academy, which had celebrated the day previous the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation by the deceased composer.

REVIEWS.

Enoch & Sons.

The Musical Monthly. A Magazine of new Copyright Music, edited by Sir Julius Benedict.

The plan of this new musical serial is somewhat novel. It is issued in two editions; edition A containing pianoforte music only; and edition B containing vocal music only. It follows that subscribers can secure one or the other, or both, at their pleasure; and, so far, the arrangement is a good one. As respects the character and scope of their enterprise, the publishers say:—"In this work the publishers will endeavour to place before the public a selection of choice copyright compositions in vocal and pianoforte music by eminent modern composers, at such a price as shall enable everybody to join the list of subscribers. Sir Julius Benedict has undertaken the editorship, and the publishers are happy to announce that contributions have already been secured from the following eminent composers:—Signor Arditi, Mr. Blumenthal, Mr. Gibsone, Mr. Hatton, Mr. Walter Macfarren, Mr. G. A. Osborne, Mr. Silas, Mr. Sloper, and Mr. H. Smart, whilst arrangements are pending with others both here and abroad. The English literary portion of the work will be under the experienced supervision of Mr. W. J. Westbrook. The publishers will endeavour always to offer only such works as are deserving of notice, and the constant contributions of French and German composers—Messrs. F. Abt, Brisson, Delaborde, Delibes, Franck, Guiraud, Jungmann, Krug, Kücken, Vilbac, Reyer, Wekerlin, &c.—will give to the work not only the attraction of containing good music, but also of being at the same time, a faithful reflex of the musical Present, and an offering calculated to gratify every variety of individual taste." So much for the prospectus; and now let us see how its assurances are justified by the first number. The pianoforte edition opens with a Saltarello by J. Duprato, which is not without considerable merit in its way, and has, moreover, the advantage of some original features. A Caprice by Francis Thomé pleases us less, but we like Mr. Ignace Gibsone's Allegretto, "Les Bavardes du Village"—an easy and graceful composition which is sure to be welcomed by the public. M. Rongé's "L'Etoile où l'on s'aime" is a Berceuse characterized by agreeable melody and effective treatment of a somewhat conventional sort; and lovers of the old dance form will see much to interest them in a gavotte, "Pompadour," by M. Renaud de Vilbac. A canzonetta, Andante cantabile, by Mr. Walter Macfarren, shows native talent to advantage by the side of its foreign rival, and the pianoforte music may be generally spoken of as bearing out the promise of the publishers, if not presenting any remarkable merit. The vocal edition begins with a song, "Good-bye," the work of Mr. Henry Smart, who, it is needless to state, cannot put pen to paper without writing something worthy of respectful notice. If, in this case, Mr. Smart has not done his very best, his composition is a healthy protest against the twaddle which too often passes current as song music, being emphatically the production of an artist. "Sleep, baby, sleep," by J. B. Rongé, is pretty enough as to the music, but the words are fashioned on the old idea of frightening baby into silence by threats of bogey, who is here represented by a big dog, ready to come and tear the infant "under mother's eye." The English translation, by Mr. Westbrook, may be judged after reading this specimen:—

"The solemn night her flock doth feed,
The silver moon her shepherdess,
And each white star a little lamb,
That wanders on in fittest dress."

We do not precisely know what this means, but then it is customary to sing nonsense to babies. "I never speak thy name aloud" is a good specimen of Franz Abt's most Abtish manner; and M. Cesar Franck's "Roses and Butterflies" is a curious if not beautiful illustration of an eccentric style. "Yonder fades the Daylight," by R. Metzdorff, will please amateurs of melancholy mood, who find their pleasure in a thoroughly dismal ditty. M. Chesneau's "The Winter's past and gone" is an agreeable song, much more likely to please the English public than some of those with which it is associated. On the whole we have a favourable opinion of Edition B—an opinion not lessened by noting that the price of the six songs is but nineponce; and if the publishers can keep up a supply of novelties equally good in subsequent issues, we see every reason why their venture should prove successful.

Willey & Co.

Looking right over the Sea. Song. Written and composed by John Old.

A pretty, simple song, with music which serves to heighten the effect of a little love story well told. The composer has been unambitious, and, because of that, more successful than otherwise would have proved the case. Success does not depend upon the scope of an effort, but upon its completeness; and here we have a small thing, admirably done.

Metzler & Co.

Three Kyries. Arranged by James Monk. From the Choir.

Two of these Kyries are adapted respectively from Mozart's "Requiem" and Weber's Mass in G; the third being Mr. Monk's own composition. All are good, and, as regards the last, we may add the high praise that it suffers nothing by comparison with the others.

Ashdown & Parry.

Tried and True. Ballad. Words by W. S. Passmore. Music by James Monk.

The verses of this song are short, and, being treated exactly alike, there is a little too much repetition. On the other hand, the music is good and effective while simple and easy.

Romance Postique. Pour Piano, par James Monk.

Mr. Monk, who knows how to write like a musician, should be above the silly weakness of using French titles. What is gained by thus flouting our good, honest English tongue? The piece before us is pretty, and admirably adapted for teaching purposes.

A. Hammond & Co.

Berlin Galop. By Gustave Michaelis.

This is a capital galop, with some novel features which cannot fail to make it acceptable. It is, moreover, quite easy.

Gemuthsleben Waltzes. By Keler Bela.

There are some agreeable melodies in these waltzes, but, as a whole, they present nothing of a striking or distinctive character.

Le Premier Baiser Valse. By Georges Lamothe.

Here we have another contribution to dance music which, while acceptable enough, adds nothing in the way of original ideas. There is no obvious reason why M. Lamothe could not go on pouring out such things ad infinitum. They must cost him but little effort.

Brise des Nuits. Valses by Georges Lamothe.

The remarks just made upon the companion piece apply equally to the music before us.

Duff & Stewart.

Blanche of Devan's Song. Sung in The Lady of the Lake. Composed by W. C. Levey.

This simple and expressive ballad has been long before the public under conditions that could hardly fail to secure for it much popularity; and all we need do is to record its publication.

La Réveillez. Marche Militaire. Pour Piano. Par Walter Macfarren.

Here is another French title to English music, and again we ask—Why? Of course nobody can give a sufficient reason. Mr. Macfarren's piece—he calls it Morceau—lacks nothing of vigour. As regards merit, its best purpose is served when it affords practice for a young student of the piano.

Alone in the World. Ballad. Words by B. S. Montgomery. Music by E. L. Hime.

This is a dish-up of very familiar phrases, garnished with the most ordinary of accompaniments.

Fancy Free. Song. Written and composed by R. Reece.

A song in waltz rhyme, which serves as the medium by which a young lady exults in her liberty. As music it is not worth much, but words and music together make a whole sufficiently agreeable for use in what is sometimes called the "social circle."

W. Morley.

Broken Dreams. Ballad. Written by J. S. Lyons. Composed by Louis Pereira.

We have simplicity in this song also, but it is attended by commonplace, all the phrases employed falling upon the ear like a tale that is told. We see no good in multiplying the number of such songs.

Chappell & Co.

Christmas Hymn and Hymn of Praise. For the Pianoforte. By A. Buhl.

There is a good deal of pretence about these two pieces, and we are not quite sure that it is justified by the result. From the titles used we may assume that the varied passages have a distinct meaning, but not possessing a key to that meaning, we cannot judge them from the composer's point of view. Sound which signifies nothing has small attraction.

Odessa.—The Italian Operahouse was burnt down on the 16th inst. Nothing could be saved. The wardrobe of the artists, music, and instruments belonging to the orchestra, were all consumed. Norma was the last performance, the heroine being represented by Madame Savertal, who has enchanted the public with her singing and acting for the last six months.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, 1873.

IT was once asserted that a celebrated political character, who held the reins of government in this country some thirty years ago, believed himself capable of doing anything, from driving a gig to commanding the Channel Fleet. Of course, the assertion was intended, and accepted, as a joke, but we believe that, despite this fact, and the exaggerated form assumed by the joke, there was a certain substratum of truth on which the assertion was founded. Il n'y a pas de fumée sans feu. If we could read the real thoughts lurking behind the protestations of humility and modesty which men use as stalking-horses when engaged in the pursuit of dignities, appointments, political influence, social consideration, and such small deer, we should probably find that the veteran statesman in question by no means estimated his skill as a charioteer, or his aptitude for the exercise of high nautical authority, as meanly as the world at large. Nor is his a solitary instance. On the contrary, few men really think there are many things which they could not do if they tried. The more ignorant they are, the more self-satisfied is their confidence in their own powers. What care they for difficulties which they do not perceive, the existence of which they do not even suspect? Anyone with his vision unimpaired, and a desire to live as long in the land as possible, will, if pursuing a path on the edge of a cliff some hundred feet or so high, be more than usually circumspect in his movements; a blind man, if not informed of his danger, would walk along the same path as gaily and confidently as if he were sauntering on the pavement of Portland Place, or lounging down the Broad Walk in Kensington Gardens.

As a natural consequence of this latent belief in themselves, all men, with scarcely an exception, are firmly convinced that they are qualified to form an opinion on any subject whatever: the conduct of a campaign; the plot of a new play; the administration of a great empire; or the metaphysical, and oftimes by no means creditable, subtleties of rival theologians. Alas! they are not even capable of seeing that, as a rule, their opinions are but the reflex of those uttered by a few individuals possessed of more real talent, or gifted with a larger amount of impudence, than the majority of those around them—as the hues of the chameleon, or the colour of the silkworm's raw contribution to the stores of Court milliners and fashionable dressmakers depend entirely upon the food which the chameleon and the silkworm respectively consume. In opinion, as in fashion, a few go first, with all the rest pressing eagerly at their heels, no matter how preposterous the opinion enunciated, or the fashion set up for imitation; and never is the game of Follow-my-Leader played with greater zest, with more unswerving obedience and accuracy, by boys and girls at school, than by those boys and girls, when, as men and women, they are subsequently engaged in the stern realities and never-ending struggles of every-day life.

Among the cries which people have thus caught up, and repeated with all the spontaniety of an echo, and with just the same amount of intelligence, is the cry about the over-remuneration of artists, especially of singers. "How beautifully So-and-So sang the other day at St. James's Hall; did not he, dear?" observes one young lady to her friend. "Oh! he did, indeed," replies the latter. "Did not he look well, too, and was not he in splendid voice? Oh! I did enjoy it so much; it was such a treat! Do you know, I hear he never sings under thirty pounds!"—'Thirty, dear! Fifty, you mean! I know he has fifty, and he deserves it." "What's that?" suddenly enquires the Papa of one of the be-panniered, bright-eyed, chignon-decorated speakers, looking over his spectacles and laying down the Blue Book on Pauperism which he has been supposed to be reading, while really listening to the conversation carried on near him. "What's that?" he repeats.

Digitized by Google

"Fifty pounds? do you mean to say that So-and-So receives fifty pounds for merely singing a song or two?"—"A song or two—I suppose, Papa, he would sing in an opera or an oratorio for the same amount, but that is the——" "Then it is too bad; a stop ought to be put to such a state of things. It is high time for Parliament to step in. When pauperism is rampant in the country; when trade is paralysed by strikes in every direction; when provisions are attaining fabulous prices, do you mean to tell me that—do you seriously assert—I—well, I maintain that—that—So-and-So ought to be ashamed of himself. I repeat: Parliament ought to put an end to this state of things. Now I recollect, it was only the other day that I was reading in the Belgravia Chronicle, that So-and-So's earnings in one year amounted to the salaries of three or four of Her Majesty's judges, or—let me see—was it the pay of all the officers of the Flying Squadron put together, Admiral and all? I am not quite sure, but it was something of the kind."

Here we have it: "I was reading in the Belgravia Chronicle." The speaker, being an average respectable member of the House, cannot well be expected to possess an opinion of his own; he depends for that commodity upon his parliamentary or journalistic leader. In this case, he has been guided by the latter; for the Press, both in England and abroad, the Press which should set a better example, and not render itself ridiculous, is far too fond of giving these comparative statistics of artists' gains, and indulging in pinchbeck moralisings thereupon. It is a funny fact, too, that, whether the paper be English, French, German, or Italian, whether it be written in one language or another, the favourite standard by which to measure the earnings of singers appears to be the emoluments received by ecclesiastical dignitaries, officers of high rank in the army or navy, and the occupants of the judicial bench. As variety is charming, we beg to suggest to our own editors that a dash of that quality might be introduced into their comments, by a change in the standard of measurement. We then might be gratified by learning that the sum paid to that eminent vocalist, Mr. C. Sharp, for his services at the last provincial festival, would purchase the "plant and goodwill of a most eligibly situated free corner publichouse at Kingsland, now in the market, and a bargain," or that Mdlle. Solfeggina earned in three days the exact sum asked for a "Baker's business, doing 21 sacks a week," and for a "Milk-Walk established upwards of half a century."

To our thinking, all such details and fancy statistical parallels are completely foreign to the subject at issue. What we fain would know is: Why should not singers enjoy as much right as other persons to obtain the highest price they can, in return for what they offer? A man fortunate enough to own a plot of ground in the City of London does not hesitate to ask thousands of pounds a foot for it; a noble coal owner raises the price of coals, without the slightest compunction, immediately the weather begins to grow cold; and a highly respectable tradesman is not above demanding twenty or thirty pounds as the rent of a window, from which a good view can be obtained of any grand national pageant, the burial of a great hero, or the thanksgiving procession of a Royal Prince; all is one to the highly respectable tradesman. Why should not exception be taken to these persons as well as to singers and other artists? But the whole question lies in a nut-shell. Leaving art for the moment out of consideration, if singers obtain what certain quidnuncs are pleased to designate preposterous terms, it is because their power of attraction is commensurate with their terms; it is because the capitalist finds them a profitable investment. For this reason, and for this reason alone, he cheerfully and wisely pays eminent artists liberally. A wine merchant who had a chance of purchasing a stock of the real Cabinet Johannisberger would not hesitate about a pound or two in the price; whatever he gave, he would be sure to get back, with a very pretty per centage into the bargain. If singers command such high prices, it is simply because they are worth them.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE assertion that the music of a ballet, by no less a person than Mozart, has been lately found in the library of the Grand Opera, Paris, was received with incredulity in many quarters. It appears, however, to be correct. The Ménéstrel promises its readers that it will shortly publish a full and detailed description of the work, which latter will, also, ere long be produced on the stage.

AT a recent interesting sale of autographs in Paris, 35 francs were given for a letter, (one page) of Chopin's; 80, for one of Hérold's; and 275 for one, in two languages, of Mozart's.

A SHORT time since, La Gazzetta Musicale di Milano published a highly curious article on "Cannon considered from a musical point of view." The first person to use cannon as a musical instrument was an Italian, Guiseppe Sarti, established in St. Petersburgh, who composed, in 1788, a "Te Deum," to celebrate the taking of the fort of Oczakoff, by Prince Potemkin. In addition to immense numbers of vocalists and instrumentalists, he introduced a great many cannons of various calibres. He placed them in the court-yard of the Imperial Palace, and employed them to strengthen, at certain moments, his basses. The effect was considered so grandly satisfactory that Catherine II. ennobled the lucky signor without a moment's hesitation. After all, as our foreign contemporary observes, cannon are not often employed in so harmless a manner.

M. ARNOLD MORTIER, the theatrical critic of the Courier de France, relates the following anecdote, highly characteristic of modern French dramatic literature. When Nestor Roqueplan was manager of the Variétiés, two friends called, for the purpose of reading him a wretched vaudeville. One of the two began as follows:—"Dramatis Personæ: Goddard, a Rentier; Agathe, his daughter; De Flex, an Officer of Cavalry. The scene represents——" Here Roqueplan interrupted the reader: "I beg pardon, my dear fellow, there are no surprises in your piece, are there? It ends by De Flex's marrying Agathe, does not it?"—"Yes, it does."—"That's all right, then; I do not require to hear the rest. It is charming. Your piece is accepted."—Roqueplan was a practical man, and the managers of the present day would not run any very great risk were they to follow his example. The vaudevilles they produce seem, with scarcely an exception, to be accepted in the way just described.

A LADY in Vienna, Madame Cornelie von Czikann, was the widow of an Austrian major, and a fine pianist. She did not play at concerts, but earned a scanty subsistence by giving lessons on her instrument. Some short time ago, she received a long letter from America. On reading it, she found she had come into a fortune; an American millionaire had left her something like a million dollars, and she was requested to come and receive her inheritance. The testator had passed a year and a half in the Austrian capital, and the lady, being acquainted with him, and knowing him to be fond of music, used to play to him an hour or so a day.

ACCORDING to a foreign contemporary, Rossini hit upon an admirable method for speedily getting rid of the very numerous unwelcome visitors who would persist in calling on him; there was not a single chair in his reception room, so that it was impossible for anyone to sit down and make himself comfortable. It was only highly favoured persons whom the composer sometimes invited to—fetch themselves a chair out of the next room.

ACCORDING to a local paper, a Vocal Burial Society will shortly be established in Minden!

A LADY visitor at a Sunday School was examining the pupils. Pointing to an "i," she enquired of an intelligent boy: "Do you know that letter, my man?"—"Oh, yes, mum, I know it very well by sight; but I can't tell you it's name."

IT is often the case that the pupil teaches his teacher. An example of this upside-down state of things is just now afforded by Japan, where has recently been issued the following:—

"DECREE AGAINST LEWD FARCES.

"On the 5th inst., Morita Kanya, and the two comedians, Kawatake Shinshichi and Sakurada Jisuke, were summoned to the office of the first division of the city. These persons were admonished by the officers thus: 'Although it cannot be doubted that all such ancient regulations as are judicious must be kept in force, it has yet been decided that hereafter the comic pieces must be modified, and that the intentional misapplications of words in all dramas may be discontinued—such as Ushiba Hisayosi for Hashiba Hideyosi. [This is one of the names of Taiko, the famous ruler of the 16th century.] If children remember Hisayosi for Hideyosi, and Harunaga for Nobunago (a predecessor of Taiko), it may finally happen that they bring themselves under great misfortune. In the theatre, not only these, but also all other things, should be represented with exactness. Although it is true that the historical plays are of the highest importance, the comedies should not be unreasonably neglected; because from them, properly performed, good lessons can often be derived. Reflect well upon this, and tell the actors of the other two houses what has been said to you. With the present civilized idea of the people, the theatre may be considered as a little college. The learning of the sages and philosophers is taught for the moral instruction of the community. The explanation of their books and the Chinese classics, and the development of historical and moral truths by actors, are nearly the same, differing only in circumstance. The actors are thus instruments of education. Such being their office, their behaviour must be carefully guarded. The best object of the theatre is now to teach the youth and women history. Therefore, to make the circumstances the same as those of the Yeddo dynasty, and give them the appearance of having happened during the Ashikaga government, is a great mistake, as those two periods are widely different. In order to reform these abuses the above notice is given, not only for the benefit of the public, but of the theatre as well."

The time is quite recent when European civilisation landed on the shore of the Mikado's singular realm. Europe may now sit humbly at the feet of Japan and learn at least one useful lesson.

PEOPLE have often wondered what became of the charming views, painted by Mr. William Beverley, that used to illustrate Albert Smith's famous Mont Blanc Lecture, at the Egyptian Hall. Some years ago we recollect seeing Mr. Phillips's Panorama of the Rhine, which formed a part of the same entertainment at the South London Music Hall; and one of Mr. Beverley's views of the Grande Rue Boulogne is in possession of a friend of the present writer. More than three years ago, passing through Maidenhead one November day, we saw the advertisement of a forthcoming entertainment in the Town Hall, which was to be illustrated "with the unique views of Albert Smith's Ascent of Mont Blanc." Not having time to stop to see the entertainment, we are unable to state whether these views were those which were actually painted for the Egyptian Hall or not. The following paragraph, which appears in a Liverpool paper, suggests that they must have come to an untimely end:—

"Those numerous admirers of the late Albert Smith, who have enjoyed his genial lectures on his Alpine experiences, charmingly illustrated as they were by a series of views painted expressly by Beverley, will regret to learn of the ultimate destruction of these scenic gems by the Prussians. A private letter from Paris states that the writer met a Madame Bouchard, who was formerly Mrs. Arthur Smith, and she informed him that she had the Mont Blanc pictures cut into sections, and placed on the walls of her villa, at Rancy, near Paris. The billiard-room walls were entirely covered with these paintings, and during the occupation of the house by the Germans as an outpost, the whole of these mural decorations, as well as 25,000 francs' worth of other property, were in one night ruthlessly destroyed by the soldiers."

Le Figaro tells a good story àpropos of Dumas' La Femme de Claude. The young lady to whom Dumas offered the rôle of the Jewish maiden objected, on the score that her face was not of an Oriental type. "But, Mademoiselle," responded the dramatist, "you forget that the Holy Virgin was a Jewess." Mademoiselle was charmed, accepted the part, and took to studying all the Virgins in the gallery of the Louvre. The result was that when she stepped on the stage, attired à la Vierge, a cry was heard—"Where are your wings?"

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

MR. AGUILAR'S performance of pianoforte music, on Thursday, Jan. 16th, at 17, Gloucester Crescent, Hyde Park, was, as usual, listened to with interest by a large audience. The following is the programme:—"Sonata, Op. 10, No. 2, Beethoven; Benediction de Dieu dans la solitude (Harmonie Poétique et religieuse), Liszt; Overture—Scherzo, Aguilar; Warum? and Novellette, No. 1 (Miss Grace Aguilar), Schumann; Prelude and Fugue in F sharp, Bach; Sonata in C minor, Aguilar; Lieder ohne worte, Mendelssohn; Weber's Last Waltz (transcription), Aguilar; The Birds at Sunset, and Esmeralda (Miss Grace Aguilar), Aguilar; Last look (Romance), and Boléro (by desire), Aguilar.

BRIXTON CHORAL SOCIETY.—The second concert of this Association was given on Monday, when Mr. Cummings' graceful cantata, The Fairy Ring, and Handel's Acis and Galatea were performed. The rendering of the cantata, though not faultless, was in many respects exceedingly good. The choruses were given with spirit and zest, the sopranos in particular deserving a word of praise for their steadiness and accurate intonation. The solo parts were entrusted to Mr. Cummings, Miss Ellen Horne, Miss Fox, and Mr. Lawler, who severally left little to be desired. The orchestral accompaniments deserve a word of censure, and had better be omitted at subsequent concerts, unless a vast improvement is possible. The band was ragged in parts, and, besides being out of tune and time, was too loud throughout. Handel's Serenata occupied the second part of the programme, the solos being taken by Miss Horne, and Messrs Lawler, Cummings, and Nelson, the last-named gentleman, who is a member of the choir, singing the airs allotted to Damon with care and refinement. Nothing could be better than the singing of the chorus. The precision and quality of tone were admirable, these qualities being well displayed in the difficult chorus, "Wretched Lovers." Mr. Lemare conducted the concert.

MISS ELCHO gave her second evening concert on Thursday evening, January 21, in the Hanover Square Rooms, with the assistance of Miss Marion Severn, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mons. Melchisedeck, and Mr. J. Barrow. Mr. J. T. Carrodus was the violinist, and Signor Randegger and Mr. F. Clarke accompanied the vocal music. Miss Elcho, as usual, showed her talents in the twofold capacity of pianist and vocalist. The Sonatas for violin and piano, by Mozart, in B flat, and Beethoven, in A, (with Mr. Carrodus), a Pastorale by Field, and the Moto continuo, by Weber, for pianoforte alone, formed her contributions to the instrumental; and Signor Randegger's song, "Only for one;" Henry Smart's duet, "When the wind blows in from the Sea;" and Blockley's "Excelsior" (with Mons. Melchisedeck), to the vocal portion of the programme. We need scarcely say that Miss Elcho acquitted herself with credit to herself and to the evident satisfaction of her friends and patrons, who duly applauded her after each performance. Mr. Carrodus, besides playing the duets with Miss Elcho already mentioned, gave a fine performance of a Chaconne for violin alone, by Bach, which brought out all his executive powers to advantage. Miss Marion Severn, whose fine voice we should like oftener to hear in public, gave a song by M. Blumenthal, and one by Mr. T. H. Severn, "He will be there," with taste and finish. M. Melchisedeck, as the exponent of M. Bordèse's "David Chantant devant Saul," was attentively listened to, and Mr. Cummings, in his own charming song, "She like a seraph sings," proved himself a master of his art. The concert altogether was an agreeable one.

MR. PRENTICE'S CONCERTS.—The following was the scheme of the fourth Brixton Monthly Popular Concert:—Mozart's Quartet in D major, No. 7, for strings; Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata;" Mendelssohn's "Andante and Variations" in D major, Op. 17, for pianoforte and violoncello; Air and Gavotte from Suite, in D, for violin, by J. S. Bach; and Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Trio in D minor, Op. 49. The quartet was very finely played by Messrs. Burnett, Folkes, R. Blagrove and Pettit, and was well received by the audience. Mr. Prentice gave a vigorous interpretation of Beethoven's grand Sonata, and was honoured with a recall. Mendelssohn's delightful duet was charmingly played by Mr. Pettit and the concert-giver, and thoroughly deserved every plaudit bestowed upon it; and Mr. Burnett showed talents of a high order as a violinist, by his performance of Bach's work. The vocalists were Mrs. Hale and Miss Adelaide Newton, who sang their songs with taste and refinement. The concert was one of the most successful Mr. Prentice has given.

THE British Orchestral Society gave their fifth concert in St. James's Hall, on Thursday evening. The novelty of the programme was Mr. Macfarren's overture to his oratorio of St. John the Baptist, which was received with enthusiasm, as was Mr. Carrodus's irreproachable performance of his late master's (Molique) concerto in A minor. The other overture was Der Freischütz (encored), and the Symphony was Beethoven's, No. 4 (in B flat). The singers were Madame Florence Lancia, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Santley. The concert was altogether a great success, and the hall was fuller than on any previous occasion. Mr. George Mount conducted the whole performance with great ability.

PROVINCIAL.

MARKET BOSWORTH.—We read in the Leicester Chronicle:—

"A grand concert was given by Mr. Henry Nicholson, assisted by Madame Thaddeus Wells and Mr. Orlando Christian, at the Assembly Rooms, on Monday evening, when a real treat was afforded. Though to eulogise any one of the three artists may seem unnecessary, it is impossible not to take note of the exquisite manner in which Madame Thaddeus Wells sustained her part throughout, especially in 'Kathleen Mavourneen,' 'Lo! hear the gentle lark,' and the inimitable 'Singing Lesson,' all of which were encored; as was Mr. Christian's 'Homeward Bound.' Mr. Nicholson did wonders on his fine-toned flute during the entire entertainment, but the rendering of his own Fantasia, and the obbligato part in Bishop's 'Lo! hear the gentle lark,' were certainly the most captivating of his splendid performances. It is gratifying to know that Mr. Nicholson expressed himself satisfied with his reception at Bosworth, and intimated that he would be encouraged to pay the town another visit at an early date."

CHICHESTER.—The following is taken from the West Sussex Gazette:—

"On Monday evening Mr. J. Burrows, lay vicar, gave an agreeable concert at the Assembly Room. The programme consisted of several choice pieces, the performers being Madame Thaddeus Wells, Mr. H. Nicholson, and the lay vicars. Madame Wells sang very charmingly "Faithful Echo," "Lo! here the gentle lark," and was most heartily encored in "Kathleen Mavourneen." Mr. Nicholson played with his usual grace and skill; and Messrs. Barber, Osmond, Fisher, Young, and Burrows, lay vicars, assisted by Mr. Pillow in one instance, sang several glees, &c. Mr. Burrows, Mr. Young, and Mr. Fisher also sang each a solo with great taste. Mr. C. Osmond was accompanist."

HIGHAM FERRERS.—The Northampton Herald, of Jan. 11, reports as subjoined:—

"Yesterday evening week Mr. W. J. Lamb gave his second grand concert in the Bede House, which was filled. The band and chorus comprised 82 performers from Higham and the neighbourhood, and, in addition, Mr. Lazarus, the celebrated clarionetist, and Mr. Percy Rivers (tenor), were engaged for the occasion. The former gentleman has already gained popularity as a perfect master of his instrument; the latter has been only a short time in this country, but he is becoming very popular, as he possesses a splendid voice and a beautiful style, which was especially brought out in the recit. and air, 'Comfort ye,' and 'Every Valley.' Miss Sanderson sang the soprano solos, and Miss Sanders the contralto. Messrs. Warren and Seal were the bass singers, and they also did ample justice to their part of the programme."

RYDE (ISLE OF WIGHT.)—A grand evening concert took place last Monday, Jan. 20th, in the new Town Hall, and gave great satisfaction to a large audience. The local singers were, Misses A. and M. White and B. Basing; Messrs. Connell, Fullen, and the Rev. Dr. Noble. Mr. E. J. Bishenden was engaged from London to sing a selection of his popular English nautical songs, which gave such great pleasure to the Ryde people on the occasion of his two previous visits to the island. A great number of the songs were encored, Mr. Bishenden's singing of Bishop's "Every Bullet" being specially admired. Miss M. Turtle, and Mr. T. W. Noble, R.A.M., were the accompanists.

EDINBURGH.—The Scotsman, of January 17th, said:—

"Professor Oakeley has so far progressed towards recovery that he was able yesterday afternoon to give an organ recital in the Music Class Room, and had a warm reception on entering. Before beginning, he alluded in a few words to his pleasure at being able to receive his friends once again, and endeavour as far as possible to him to re-awaken the tones of the University organ, and he expressed his thanks for the greeting elicited by kind sympathy as very musical to him. If any change, he said, in the playing is detected, it will be borne in mind that the effort is made under still existing bodily weakness and infirmity; and he added that, in making the effort, no risk is incurred, but rather the contrary, in respect to progress towards recovery."

DUBLIN.—In the Freeman's Journal, of January 15, we read the following:—

"The genial popularity which has attended the vocal and histrionic performances of Mdlle. Emilie Georgi, at the Gaiety Theatre, is but the measure of her dessert. Few actresses possess her easy grace and piquant cleverness, and few have achieved such wide-spread favour in so short a time with an audience so critical as ours. Every successive opera proves her rich resources, her careful training, ready capacity, and 'nameless numberless graces' which she possesses. This young lady, whether regarded as vocalist or actress, must be recognized as an artist of quite exceptional merit. Her songs have been made popular by her cleverness; and she has never undertaken a character which she did not raise in general esteem. Since her arrival she has won hosts of friends, and indeed she deserves them all."

WOKINGHAM.—Mr. T. S. Brown, organist of the Parish Church, gave his annual concert in the Town Hall, on Monday, Jan. 20th, assisted by Miss A. Larkcom, Miss Lazarus, R. A. M., and Messrs. Large, Hunt, and Orlando Christian. There was a large and fashionable audience. Randegger's trio, "I Naviganti," was nicely rendered by Miss Larkcom, Mr. Hunt, and Mr. Christian, and loudly applauded. Mr. Christian sang Mr. Emanuel's grand scena, "The Desert," and drew forth an enthusiastic demand for its repetition. He also sang a capital descriptive song, "The Raft," by Signor Pinsuti. Miss A. Larkcom, who is a great favourite here, was recalled after M. Gounod's "Serenade." Miss Lazarus was well applauded for a pianoforte solo, and also accompanied the vocal music effectively. The concert was under the direction of Mr. Christian.

BENTLEY-FARNHAM.—The Choral Society gave a concert on Jan. 13th. The first part was Locke's music to Macbeth, and the second miscellaneous. Mr. C. J. Bishenden was engaged for the occasion, and acquitted himself to the satisfaction of the audience. Mr. Bishenden was called upon to repeat "Hearts of Oak." The other vocalists were members of the society, and the chorus showed they had been carefully trained.

HULL.—Miss Bolingbroke has given a concert in the Public Rooms, and the Hull Packet, of January 17th, has the following remarks on the young artist's performances:—

"Miss Bolingbroke, whose earlier efforts have so charmed her fellow townspeople and gave such promise of future eminence, was in excellent voice, and, after her successes at the London Academy of Music, she was received with a welcome as enthusiastic as it was sincere. From the brilliant manner in which she acquitted herself it is evident that she has made even greater advance in the profession than many of her most sincere well-wishers could have hoped, and it is an advance, too, which reflects credit upon her perseverance and application to study as well as upon her native town. Among the artists by whom she was assisted on the occasion was her brother, Mr. F. C. Bolingbroke, who, though young, has already gained an enviable position as a flautist, in London; Miss Alice Jennings, a student and medallist at the London Academy; Mr. Brandon, bass; Mr. Moxon, tenor; Mrs. De Sternberg-Harding, who is one of our most accomplished local pianists; and M. Paque, solo violoncellist to Her Majesty, whose perfect and brilliant execution surprised and delighted all who heard him. He played a fantasia, 'Lucia,' of his own composition, and the exquisite delicacy of touch, and easy manipulation of some difficult passages, afforded intense delight to lovers of high-class instrumental music. Equally admired were his solos, 'Praise of Tears,' and 'Serenade Algerienne,' which were faultlessly rendered, and elicited the heartiest tokens of appreciation. Mr. T. Craddock accompanied the vocal music on the pianoforte in musicianly style, and the concert was altogether a great success."

WEIMAR.—The programme of the third Orchestral Concert included "Leonoren Sinfonie" (founded on Bürger's ballad), Klughardt; Concert-Ouverture, Abert; Concerto in E flat minor, Beethoven; "Ungarische Rhapsodie," Liszt; Scherzo for Orchestra, Goldmark; and Songs, Schumann, Schubert, and Gounod.—Mdlle. Amann has appeared very successfully as Elizabeth in Tannhäuser.

AGRAM.—A four-act opera, Amelia, has just been successfully produced. It is said to be a youthful effort of Johann von Zaje. The libretto, translated into Croatian by M. V. Gjorgjevic, is founded upon Schiller's play of Die Räuber, which the librettist, however, has cut and slashed about, altered and modified, just as it suited his purpose.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-ODER.—A very interesting Soirée was lately given by Herr de Ahna, assisted by Herren Hellmich, Schulz, and Wrede. The programme comprised, among other things, Beethoven's Grand Quartet in B flat major, Op. 130; the Pianoforte Quartet in G minor, Mozart; and the Quintet, Op. 44, Robert Schumann.

BRUSSELS.—It will now, probably, not be long ere Tannhäuser is produced at the Théâtre de la Monnaie. The instrumental portion is already in rehearsal under the direction of M. J. Dupont.—M. Avrillon is in negotiation with Mdme. Nilsson, for a short series of performances to commence on the 15th April at the above theatre.

There was a shrewd critic—John Oxenford.
If you think you could go to the docks, and ford
The Thames when 'tis high,
And keep your feet dry,
You may think to get over John Oxenford.

AUSTRIAN MILITARY MUSIC.

(Extract from a Letter.)

The Austrian military music has for a long series of years enjoyed the very best reputation in Europe. At the Universal Exhibition of 1867, in Paris, it will be remembered, the Austrian military band excited general admiration. The reduced term of active service in the Austro-Hungarian army, as now established, threatens seriously to affect the efficiency of the military bands in the empire. Formerly the men had to serve in their regiments fourteen, and at a later period eight, years. At present a three years' service is all that is required, and although it is very possible to obtain very able performers on the various instruments used in military bands even within this shorter period, yet no sooner is their training completed than the men quit the service, or, if they consent to remain, their demands involve a far greater expense than the officers can afford to defray. The same labour has therefore to be repeated with the recruits every year, without the possibility of retaining their services when they have become proficients in the art, except under too onerous conditions. Hence, in order to prevent the inevitable decay of the once famous "military music" in this country, already two years ago an institution was created in the army called "Music Pupils;" but it did not answer, and had consequently to be abandoned. It would lead too far to explain "the why and wherefore." Suffice it to say the aforesaid dilemma still exists. Some few months since another project was started by M. William Westmeyer, well known to the musical world in Germany by "The Austrian Emperor's Overture," "The Forest of Hermannstadt," "The Vision on St. Helena," &c. This gentleman proposed to create an "Austrian Conservatory for Military Music." With energy and patriotic zeal M. Westmeyer elaborated a plan of organization, to be commended on account of its originality and its practicability. According to his plan this musical academy should receive from 400 to 500 pupils, who have attained their 18th year, and are bound to remain in the institution for three years, during which period they should be educated not only in the art of music, but also in such general knowledge and military duties as would be useful to them for life after quitting the military service. In consideration of receiving this education gratis, the pupils should be bound to serve as musicians in the army for three years more on leaving the "Conservatory." Thus, the young men would serve six years, from the age of 18 to 24, and then be at liberty to follow such civil vocations as their circumstances and general knowledge may fit them for.

M. Westmeyer's project has been highly approved on all sides. The highest military authorities have strongly recommended it to the Emperor Francis Joseph for adoption, the more so as, also, the two greatest musical authorities in Germany—M. Jules Rietz, chef d'orchestre to the Court of Saxony, and Director of the Conservatory at Dresden, and M. de Herbeck, Director of the Imperial Operahouse at Vienna—have reported thereon most favourably. M. Westmeyer's efforts to overcome the pecuniary difficulties which stood in the way induced a wealthy patriot, M. de Schwarz, of Salsburg, to make a present to the Imperial Ministry of War of a large house and garden, situate in one of the suburbs of this city, for the "Military Music Conservatory" for all time to come. This munificent gift was accepted, and the compliment returned by the creation of a barony for M. de Schwarz. Moreover, M. Westmeyer succeeded in obtaining subscriptions and donations amounting to upwards of 60,000 florins. The correctness of these data I can vouch for; but is it not strange that, up to the present moment, the "Military Music Conservatory" has not been called into life; and the inevitable decline of the Austrian military bands is still permitted to disquiet the consciences of all lovers of military music in the empire? And why? Baron Kuhn, the Imperial Minister of War, is supposed to be at loggerheads with Colonel Horst, the Cis-Leithan Minister of National Defence, upon the subject. Meanwhile, the practical acknowledgment of M. Westmeyer's deserts in the matter is postponed sine die, it being assumed that the old adage of "procrastination being the thief of time" no longer holds good. As this subject is of more or less importance to all the European armies, in which the active service of the men has of late years been considerably reduced, I have deemed it right to call the attention of your readers to M. Westmeyer's project of a "Military Music Conservatory."

Mr. Hallet Sheppard's new Mass, for male voices, was performed at the Beethoven Rooms, on Monday, by an efficient choir, in the presence of Dr. Manning, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster, and many clergymen, and it has many points of excellence, and will be available for practical use in the Roman Catholic Church. It was loudly applauded. Mr. C. S. Jekyll presided at the pianoforte; Mr. O'Leary Edwards at the harmonium, the composer directing the whole of the performance.

WAIFS.

M. Delaborde is now on a visit to London.

Herr Hans von Bülow has recently been playing in Brussels.

A ballet entitled Le Forgeron de Gretna-Grenn (sic), is in rehearsal at the Grand Opéra.

M. Jules Simon has supplied the necessary materials for the proposed monument to Auber.

M. Thiers attended the fourth conservatoire concert of this season and was warmly received.

The Théâtre Italien of Paris has closed its doors, and the direction has declared itself bankrupt.

Signor Federici is now added to the list of barytones engaged by Mr. Gunn, for his English Opera Company in Dublin.

A poet in Pittsburgh has sent to a local paper a poem, in which he alludes to the dew as "the perspiration of the moon."

The Emperor of Austria has written to Verdi, begging him to direct in person the forthcoming representations, at Vienna, of Aida.

We are happy to learn that Prince Poniatowski is recovering from his illness, and is able to assure his friends that they need be under no alarm.

It is positively stated that Signor Campanini is engaged by Mr. Max Strakosch, for the Adelina Patti tour in the United States of America, next year.

Mr. John Francis Barnett has just finished an overture for the British Orchestral Society, the subject of which was suggested by The Winter's Tale of Shakspere.

A new English opera company has been organized, embracing the following singers: Miss Rose Hersée, Miss Emma Howson, Mrs. Zelda Seguin, Mr. Nordblom and Mr. Gustavus Hall.

Signor Campobello is singing in the provinces, with Mr. Mapleson's Opera and Concert Party, comprising Mdlle. Tietjens, Mesdames Sinico, Macvitz, Signors Borella, Tombesi, and Agnesi.

Mr. Francis Howell's oratorio, The Land of Promise, was given lately at the United Presbyterian Church, at Blackburn. The local press speak in high terms of the music, and of its performance by the congregation, accompanied by a full band of instrumentalists.

Mdlle. Christine Nilsson has written from Russia announcing her intention of playing in London, in the ensuing season, in M. Balfe's last opera, The Talisman (MS.), to be produced by Mr. Mapleson. Madame Parepa-Rosa has also been negotiating for the right of producing it in the United States.

A lecture was given on Irish music in Dublin, by Sir Robert P. Stewart, and a great effect was created by the choir singing an Irish Caoine, (by one of his pupils). The circumstance of the singers being concealed, imparted a mysterious effect to the dirge in question, which Sir Robert stated he heard many years ago at a funeral procession entering the ancient Priory of St. John the Baptist, Turin.

Earl de Grey, only child, and son and heir of the Marquis and Marchioness of Ripon, comes of age on the 29th inst. A grand concert will be given, on this occasion, in the large drawing-room, Studley, on the same evening. A special feature will be an ode, composed for the occasion by Dr. Spark, words by Mr. F. Curzon. A large choir, selected from the Leeds Madrigal and Motet Society, and the Leeds Harmonium Union, are engaged, with Mdlle. Pauline Rita and Mr. Vernon Rigby, as principals, and Miss Florence May as solo pianist.

On Saturday a valuable service of plate was presented to Sir Robert P. Stewart, of Dublin, by the members of the Catholic Choirs, the Philharmonic Society, the Bray Philharmonic Society, and other of his numerous friends; the following is the inscription upon the salver:—

"Presented to Sir Robert P. Stewart, Mus. Doc., professor of music in the University of Dublin, by his friends, in testimony of their regard and esteem, and in commemoration of the honour of knighthood being conferred upon him, February 28, 1872. We understand that it is contemplated to add to the above an album containing the carte-de-visite of each subscriber as a souvenir, in accordance with Sir Robert Stewart's own request."

Mdlle. Louise Liebhart is a pure soprano, and sang the beautful air, "Angels ever bright and fair," the ballad of "Robin Adair," a German song, "Ruck-Ruck," and in response to a call, gave "Home, sweet home." Her pronunciation of English is also faultless. Her voice is clear, delicate rather than powerful, and of considerable range. There was something in her singing of "Robin Adair" and "Home, sweet home" that recalled Nilsson. She belongs to the same school, and in her intonation and style there is such resemblance of method that one would conjecture they had been trained by the same master. There was genuine feeling in her interpretation of the songs, and grace of delivery, added to the sympathetic tones of her voice, was indescribably charming.—Cincinnati Commercial.

Reflection does not seem to have lessened the estimation which Miss Purdy earned by her singing in the Messiah at Great Yarmouth—her first appearance as an oratorio singer. The Norfolk Chronicle, in reviewing the performance says, that:—"Miss Purdy (contralto) possesses a fine voice, which she displayed with good effect in "O Thou that tellest good tidings," and in the touching air "He was despised." We hope to hear this young lady again."

A "clever" critic of a daily paper, in descanting upon a recent performance of The School for Scandal in this city, thinks that the actor who assumed the rôle of Moses, the money-lender, was unfortunate because he "could not catch the Hebrew accent." So we are favoured with a new lesson in philology. There is a "Hebrew accent" for actors to acquire, else they cannot be expected to play judiciously that elevated branch of the drama known as the stage Jew. Now, is it not strange? Here are we, editors of a Jewish journal, supposed to be familiar with Hebrew manners and History, and yet we confess that we are ignorant of such a fact as the Hebrew accent? And there are thousands of our readers, presumably intelligent, who are equally ignorant on this interesting subject. What can it be? Please, Mr. Critic, favour us with your acute perceptions, and teach us, without any pretensions on our part to tread the mimic stage, how, and where, and when, to "catch the Hebrew accent."—Jewish Messenger.

Referring to some recent publications of Messrs. Ashdown and Parry, the Daily Telegraph observed:—

"Every amateur pianist of classical tendencies will be glad to know that this firm has issued a second series of 'Popular Classics for the Pianoforte,' edited by Mr. Walter Macfarren. The twelve numbers include examples of Bach, Haydn (Sonatas in E minor and F), Beethoven (two Minuets), Dussek ('L'Adieu'), Hummel, Schumann, and Handel, each piece being edited with care, and the more difficult passages fingered. We cannot too highly praise so admirable an effort to popularise music of the highest order; and the publishers, who had before done so much in the same way, have now placed the art under an additional obligation. They have also issued Schumann's 'Novelletten' (Op. 21), in a series of eight numbers. The well-known character of these very characteristic pieces makes needless any remark upon their value; and amateurs who desire to know a much-debated composer in one of his most agreeable moods may be trusted not to let slip the opportunity now afforded."

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine, (Longman & Co.,) they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from, Patti, Grisi, Labiache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

PREFACE.

No country possesses more good voices than England, and many voices would be a fortune to their owners if they knew how to use them.

Vocal Exercises, however, are much neglected, owing, in a great measure, to their monotony of passage and of style.

The object of these Studies is to make practice as attractive as possible, and the Waltz form has therefore been chosen for its liveliness.

A selection has been made of passages best suited to give flexibility to the voice, and the six Waltzes here presented contain the germs of a thorough method of vocal practice.

The Italian language is preferred on account of the openness of the vowels; but these studies can be used advantageously without words, by simply "vocalising" on the vowel A (pronounced in Italian, Ah.)

Commas (,) are placed where breath is to be taken. At first, however, pupils should practise each study very slowly, and draw breath whenever found necessary.

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.

KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country. The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. VAN PRAAG.

MR. VAN PRAAG, who has been for many years past well known to the members of the Musical Profession, and the public, as holding a responsible position at the principal Concert-rooms of the West End, is now, in his 74th year, and almost blind, left without the means of sustenance and support. In addition to his failing health and strength, he has also recently become a widower, and is, by this sad bereavement, left alone, with not a relative in England to aid or take care of him. He has children in California who wish him to go out to them, and it is his own desire, notwithstanding his age and infirmities, to do so. Want of means for undertaking so long and expensive a journey, which his children are unable to supply, however, preclude the possibility of his leaving England. Under these sad circumstances, a few friends, well able to bear witness to his respectability, honesty, and courtesy in the discharge of the duties he has so "well and worthily fulfilled," are anxious to raise a Subscription in his behalf, to which contributions are earnestly and respectfully requested.

MISS PURDY will sing, at the Brixton Chamber Concerts (Mr. Ridley Prentice's), an Air by Stradella, Schubert's "WITHER," and take part in a Duet, by Bishop. Town address, 35, Victoria Road, Kensington, W.

MR. JENNINGS.

MR. JENNINGS, for many years Principal OBOEIST, Manchester Gentlemen's Concert Society, Liverpool Philharmonic Society, Mr. Halle's Concerts, &c., begs to announce that he has quitted Manchester and taken up his permanent residence in London, and is free to accept Engagements.

This announcement is rendered necessary, from the fact that his long connection with Liverpool and Manchester has for many years prevented his accepting Engagements in London. Address, 50, Shursted Street, Kennington Park, S.E.

MR. JOHN JACKSON, A.R.A.M., has returned to town. For Singing and Harmony Lessons, apply at his residence, 29, Alfred Place, Bedford Square, W.C. N.B.—Compositions, revised, &c.

TO PROFESSORS OF MUSIC.—FOR SALE, a very Respectable and Old Established PROFESSIONAL CONNECTION, an easy distance from London. The purchaser, if competent, would, in all probability, obtain the appointment of Organist to the Parish Church, and, as there is no Pianoforte Dealer in the town, there is a good opportunity for increasing an income from that source. For further particulars apply to Mr. Frederick Lucas, Public Accountant, 26, Maddox Street, London, W.

CONCERTS, Bazaars, Hebrew Weddings, Readings, Meetings, and Balls.—The QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover Square. Early application is invited for securing available days. Apply to Mr. Hall.—ROBERT COCKS, Proprietor.

MIDLAND COUNTIES GRAND MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—Sir Michael Costa's Oratorio, "NAAMAN," will be given for the first time by the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society, on Thursday morning next, February 6th. ## ST. PAUL'S DAY.

Had any attendant at the metropolitan cathedral in the easy-going days of Dean Milman visited it last Saturday afternoon, unconscious of recent change, he would have been not a little astonished at that which was to be seen and heard. But, indeed, change of any kind within cathedral precincts is astonishing, even when the building does not stand, like a huge petrifaction, in the midst of a sleepy Close, but is ever disturbed by the ebb and flow of a roaring tide of life. The time is quite recent when musical reform in St. Paul's seemed as hopeless as the abolition of visitor's fees. A scanty and inefficient choir attended irregularly, and sang very much as it pleased, while the "service of song" was looked at with an eye so perfunctory that on one memorable occasion the boys and a deputy alto were called upon for Handel's "Hallelujah." So it had been from the beginning, and the "rest and be thankful" spirit which naturally prevails among cathedral dignitaries made change for the better a most unlikely thing. But change has come along with the new men who proverbially bring new measures. Liberty of suggestion and freedom of action have been granted to a young and able organist; the choir, increased to forty boys, with a proportionate number of men, is subject to strict rules, having thorough efficiency in view, and, what is best of all, because underlying all, the authorities are showing themselves alive to the value of music as a handmaid of religion. Though the Puritan horror of "performances" in churches is fast dying out, their value is even yet inadequately appreciated; but we may hope that the attractions of music in its highest forms will soon come to be looked upon as equally legitimate with those of oratory. Dean Stanley's introduction of Bach's Passion of St. Matthew to Westminster Abbey was a marked advance; and the latest observance of St. Paul's Day in St. Paul's Cathedral has brought the result still nearer.

Rumours had long been prevalent that great things were contemplated in honour of the Apostle's Feast, and authoritative confirmation of these rumours brought a throng around the cathedral doors long before the time,—three o'clock—fixed for their opening. The special service began an hour later, during which interval crowds poured into the noble edifice, filling it from the altar steps to the western entrance, and from end to end of the transept. The Cathedral being lighted as for the customary evening service, the semi-gloom of its remoter parts gave an appearance of extra vastness to the huge congregation, making the scene absolutely imposing as viewed from the height of the choir gallery. No assemblage of worshippers could have behaved with greater reverence, nor could the special arrangements of the day have been carried out in more orderly fashion. Sharp ears, it is true, could hear faint sounds as of an orchestra tuning in the distance, and some curiosity was shown when a band of our best instrumentalists, headed by Mr. Weist Hill, entered, and took their places on the floor at the western end of the choir. Soon after, the cathedral clergy, preceded by 120 surpliced choristers, filed in, and seated themselves in the choir stalls, the organ remaining all the time obstinately mute. But there was a purpose in its silence. For once the "king of instruments" had to take secondary rank, even in its own special domain, and to hand over the "in voluntary" to the orchestra, which, conducted by Dr. Stainer, played the overture to St. Paul with an effect that charmed all hearers. Softened and mellowed by the vast space of the building, but not rendered inaudible to the most distant, the chorale of Mendelssohn's stately Prelude, and even the rapid passages of the Fugue were heard to the utmost advantage; nor was the effect at all out of harmony with the place and the occasion. On the contrary, the orchestral music seemed to convey more of tender religious expression, and to appeal more strongly to the emotions of the congregation, than could the organ, though touched by the fingers of Mr. George Cooper himself. Following the overture, and in conformity with an arrangement which handed all the congregation over to the preacher, came the sermon, delivered by the Rev. Prebendary Dalton, M.A., from 2 Timothy iv. 5. The reverend gentleman, who doubtless bore in mind that some thousands of those he addressed could not make out a word, was commendably brief, and at the close of his discourse, the order of Evening Prayer began. The responses, sung to the prescriptive "Tallis," were given with imposing grandeur; and in the "Service," technically so called, a novel effect was produced by the co-operation of the orchestra with choir and organ. If Dr. Stainer may be credited with this idea, and its efficient carrying out, his credit is great indeed; the string and wind instruments being charmingly heard in contrast with the organ, and lending to the ensemble a variety of colour otherwise beyond reach. A long selection from the oratorio, which had already contributed its overture to the service, was given, in the place assigned by the Prayer-book, to the Anthem. This was, of course, the supreme act of the Festival, and here, also, the wisdom of the arrangements appeared. Not less than twenty numbers of St. Paul were performed, without the slightest interference with the usual order of Evening Prayer, or the slightest approach to anything at variance with the solemnity and decorum of worship. The Cathedral authorities discovered that "Anthem" is an elastic term, and they took a course which will surely become a precedent wherever the æsthetics of religion are valued. Beginning with the recitative, "And he journeyed with his companions towards Damascus," the selection included all that follows of the first part of the oratorio—that is to say, the narrative of Saul's conversion, and the visit to him of Ananias. No lover of Mendelssohn's fine work will need reminding that this section comprises the grand chorus, "Rise up, arise;" the equally grand chorale, "Sleepers wake;" the pathetic air, "O God have mercy;" and the glorious finale, "O great is the depth." From the second part was taken the narrative of Paul's setting out with Barnabas, including the duet, "Now we are ambassadors," and the well-known chorus, "How lovely are the messengers," this being followed by the scene wherein Paul bids farewell to the Church at Ephesus, and goes up to meet "bonds and affliction" at Jerusalem. Nothing was omitted from the last-named beautiful and touching incident, the music to which is rarely heard in concert-rooms, owing to the rush of departures, and no effect could have been greater than that which it produced. Speaking of the performance generally, we have little save words of praise. The choral singing was admirable, and if unsteadiness had been avoided in the rare instances where it was apparent—if, also, the organ had more carefully proportioned its volume of tone to that of the band and chorus, no adverse criticism would now be possible. The tenor recitatives, &c., were divided between Messrs. Kerr Gedge and F. Walker, the first-named gentleman singing "Be thou faithful unto death" with much skill and expression. To Mr. Winn fell all the bass solos, none of which could suffer anything in the hands of an artist so competent; and the solos for soprano were allotted to Masters Grover, Couldery, and Butten, who—the first especially—sang with a correctness as noticeable as was the beauty of their fresh young voices. At the close of the selection the prayers were resumed; and, at the close of the prayers, the vast congregation slowly dispersed, hundreds lingering to admire Mr. George Cooper's splendid performance of Bach's Prelude and Fugue, (St. Ann's), which appropriately brought the musical doings to an end.

Stimulated by the success of St. Paul's Day, the Dean and Chapter will, let us hope, carry out the idea they are said to entertain of introducing Bach's Passion at one of the Lenten services. In this hope all who heard the old master's work in Westminster Abbey will join.

GRATZ.—A short time since, an association was formed under the name of the Gratz Musicians' Union (Grazer Musikerbund), for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of its members, orchestral performers, who are very miserably remunerated, and, consequently, far from well off. It was proposed to give a monster concert in aid of the capital-fund, and, with a view of making the concert a certain success, to write to Herr R. Wagner, requesting him to conduct it, and draw up the programme. Madame Cosima Wagner wrote back to say that Herr R. Wagner would come, conduct, and even bring the Feuerzauber with him, if the concert were given for the benefit of the Baireuth Theatre. The Union have accepted the terms, and declared, with an alacrity that quite excites our pity, that they are ready to perform his work for nothing. They hope that Wagner will be grateful, and, in his turn, do something for them. The poor fellows will probably find that they are marvellously mistaken in their reckoning, and that the only benefit they will ever receive from their devotion will be the honour of being held up in the usual Wagnerian journals for other associations to imitate. "We recommend the Grazer Musikerbund," says the Berlin Echo, "to enquire of the Berlin Musical Union what advantage the latter derived from its expensive ovation to Herr R. Wagner, an ovation graciously accepted, but acknowledged only by a few words of thanks. Herr R. Wagner, even when occupying an influential position at Munich, never did a single thing to improve the condition of his poorer brothers in art, and, in all likelihood, never will. We sincerely, and from the bottom of our hearts, condole with the young, and consequently inexperienced, association, in its first step in life. By co-operating in schemes of this kind, which simply serve the ambition of others, it mistakes its aim, and at once jeopardises its existence."

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—Pursuing the course adopted by him in Wiesbaden, Leipsic, and elsewhere, Herr Richard Wagner has brought an action against the Municipality for author's rights. He asserts that it was not to the Stadttheater, or Town Theatre, that he sold the power of representing his operas, but simply to the then manager, Herr Hofmann. He asserts that the Town did not inherit that power from Herr Hofmann, and, therefore, has been performing his works illegally for a long series of years. It was on these grounds that Rienzi was never produced here; Herr Wagner was perfectly ready to allow the manager to bring it out, but not the Stadttheater, as such. The reader will perceive from the above that Herr Wagner is a pretty smart man of business, as well as a composer and poet.

BRITISH ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

The overture to Mr. G. A. Macfarren's MS. oratorio, St. John the Baptist, was played for the first time at the concert given by this society, in St. James's Hall, last Thursday evening week. Having been promised in the scheme of the season, its performance was anticipated with curiosity, not only because of the light it would possibly throw upon the work as a whole, but also because of the high rank in art held by its learned composer. Mr. Macfarren, as few who know his writings require to be told, is a progressive musician, keenly alive to the value of whatever is good, without reference to its age or origin. Very naturally, therefore, a new work from his pen is expected to show sympathy with advanced ideas; or at any rate with ideas which, because more or less new, enjoy the credit of that position. Such expectation was not disappointed on Thursday week, inasmuch as Mr. Macfarren's overture decidedly carries on the movement that, since Handel's day, has changed the oratorio prelude from a prelude merely into a tone picture. In the overture to Elijah, Mendelssohn used orchestral music as a part of his "argument," making it convey a vivid idea of the distress Divine chastisement had brought upon the Hebrew nation. This resort to what is sometimes called "programme music" was perfectly legitimate, because the composer's meaning could not be mistaken; nor could any confusion or sense of indefiniteness attend it. Mr. Macfarren has gone farther than Mendelssohn, but with an equal right; that is to say, he has made his overture more elaborately descriptive than the overture to Elijah, while linking it as closely as the narrative. True, the composer's meaning is less obvious, on account of elaboration; but, happily, a musical author is not forbidden in our time, any more than when Beethoven wrote the "Pastoral Symphony," to tell us what his music signifies. Mr. Macfarren did this in the annotated programme, from which we learn that his work depicts the "anxious expectancy among the Hebrew nation that preceded the Advent." It also suggests their longing by portraying "some of the ideas of the form under which the King of Glory would reveal himself," and their disappointment at the "unsatisfaction of every hope." Mr. Macfarren was bold to set himself a programme so comprehensive, involving so much that is abstract and, by consequent indefiniteness, not easily grasped. But his case is not one of vaulting ambition that overleaps itself. From the opening notes of the "ram's horn" announcing the Sabbath, to the close, the assured march of his music, and the ease with which every idea is worked out, prove that Mr. Macfarren keeps well within his means. The overture is scored with great fullness, and its style is of the freshest character, but we are conscious of no exaggeration or undue pretence. In point of fact, we are conscious of nothing but that a master of musical language is carrying us with him by the simple force of his eloquence. Without the score at hand, minute criticism of a work so elaborate in its details cannot be attempted, and general impressions must needs suffice. Those impressions are so entirely favourable, that it is no rashness to pronounce Mr. Macfarren's overture one of the finest examples of classical art that England has yet produced. How far the audience held this opinion, their hearty applause when Mr. Macfarren appeared on the platform made evident. The performance, conducted by Mr. Mount, did justice to the work, and was a credit to the orchestra.

Another marked success on Thursday week was that gained by Mr. Carrodus's performance of Molique's concerto in A minor, for violin and orchestra. The work itself was gracefully chosen as a tribute from the artist to the memory of his master; and it was not less well chosen on account of merit, both as a means of display and as music. So sublime a concerto ought not to lie neglected, even though it may come short of the standard set by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and in certain instances, perhaps, by Spohr. But admiration of the concerto was well-nigh absorbed in admiration of its performance. Mr. Carrodus has long been recognized as a violinist of rare attainments; yet few, perhaps, who heard him on this occasion were prepared for the display he made. Beauty and fullness of tone throughout the entire range of the "marvel of music"—to use Mr. Gladstone's happy description of the violin—executive skill, which was never at fault amid enormous difficulties, and a command of expression great enough to suggest the highest artistic faculties—these were the merits of a performance worthy to hold a place in the memory of all who heard it. The triumph of Mr. Carrodus was complete, and at the close of his task the audience gave way to genuine enthusiasm, recalling the artist amid a storm of applause. As regards the remainder of the programme it must suffice to mention that Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and the overture to Der Freischütz (encored), were well played; and that some excellent vocal pieces were contributed by Mdme. Lancia, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Santley.

NICE.—The Abbate Franz Liszt—whom the pope lately characterised as quel barratino, "that puppet," or "Jack-pudding"—intends shortly visiting this place. He will probably give a concert or two.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

The first concert of the "Royal Albert Hall Amateur Orchestral Society," about which there has for some time been a great deal of talk in musical circles, was given on Wednesday evening. That it should attract a numerous and fashionable audience might for more reasons than one—but for one in particular—have been expected. A Prince of the Royal Blood was, it was generally reported, to be among the orchestral players—not to exhibit his talent as a "virtuoso," but simply to take part in the general performance, like any other member of the band. The Duke of Edinburgh's love of music is no secret, and that the instrument of his choice is the violin is equally well known. A passion for the "divine art" has been the characteristic of numerous Emperors, Kings, and Grand Dukes; and, without going back so far as Nero, we may mention Frederick of Prussia, who was an expert performer on the flute; and Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia, patron and intimate personal friend of the greatest pianist and composer for the pianoforte of his day—J. L. Dussek. Prince Louis Ferdinand cultivated music assiduously, both as composer and executant. Other instances might be named by the score; but both Frederick and Louis Ferdinand—the latter, whatever he may have owed to his cherished ally, Dussek, a clever composer as well as a clever pianist—preferred taking a leading part in all their musical displays. We can scarcely recall an example of one in such high position who cared for art alone without thought of self-glorification. Our Duke of Edinburgh, however, is one of very few exceptions, and at the concert last night he undertood the duties of a ripieno violin, reading from the same desk as the official leader of the orchestra—Mr. H. Enthoven, if we may rely upon the printed catalogue. The Duke's absolute claims to consideration as a violinist it is therefore impossible to estimate; but that he laboured as conscientiously and as strenuously as any of his companions to contribute to the effect of the performances may be stated without reserve. No doubt the audience would have preferred hearing so distinguished an amateur in a solo, but that is probably reserved for a future occasion. The programme of last night's concert was very good as a whole, and that it was also very well balanced with a view to contrasts of style may be seen by the subjoined:—

|---|---|
| Symphony, "Military" ... ... ... ... | Haydn. |
| Song, "The Sailor's Grave"—Mr. E. G. Cleather | A. S. Sullivan. |
| Solo (Pianoforte), "Concertstück"—Mr. J. H. Cobley ... ... ... ... ... ... | Weber. |
| Song, "Reverie"—Miss Jessie Jones ... ... | Schira. |
| Overture, Zanetta ... ... ... ... | Auber. |

PART II.

|---|---|
| Overture, Egmont ... ... ... ... | Beethoven. |
| Cavatina, "Nobil Signor"—Miss Augustine Roche | Meyerbeer. |
| Duet, "Trust her not"—Mrs. Burkingyoung and Miss Mabel Mount ... ... ... ... | Balfe. |
| March, "Prophète" ... ... ... ... | Meyerbeer. |

Of Haydn's famous "Military Symphony" (conducted by Mr. Arthur Sullivan) only the first and second movements were given; and, considering that the entire orchestra,—a very numerous orchestra, complete at all points,—was, excepting four of the double basses (Messrs. Howell, Pratten, Reynolds, and White,) composed of amateurs, extremely well given. Of Weber's no less famous Concertstück (conductor, Mr. George Mount, of the British Orchestral Concerts,) a fragment of the March and the final movement were alone presented; but the finale was played with such animation by Mr. J. H. Cobley that he was called upon to repeat it, and with little hesitation consented. Auber's quaint, delicate, and charming overture to Zanetta (conductor, Mr. Sullivan,) was performed remarkably well, and so was the pompous and brilliant march from the Prophète of Meyerbeer (conductor, Mr. Mount). Beethoven's Egmont (conductor, Mr. Sullivan,) was, perhaps, a little beyond the means, if not beyond the conception, of the amateur orchestra; nevertheless, there were excellent points in its rendering.

The vocal music was for the most part well selected and well sung. Miss Jessie Jones, pupil, we believe, of the Royal Academy of Music, gave the expressive "Reverie" of Signor Schira with touching effect; Miss Augustine Roche was very successful in the air from the Huguenots; and the late Balfe's piquant duet, "Trust her not" (Longfellow) was done full justice to by Mrs. Burkingyoung and Miss Mabel Mount. All the vocal pieces were accompanied with the pianoforte.

The second concert is announced for Wednesday, the 5th of March.

CREFELD.—Der Blumen Rache (The Revenge of the Flowers), by Herr Alexander Dorn, was produced for the first time at the third Subscription Concert. The text is a well-known poem of the same name, by Freiligrath. Two choruses were especially effective. The solo music was entrusted to Mdlle. Büschgens. The audience were liberal in their applause.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

If I have been idle the last few weeks the "concord of sweet sounds" has not been inactive during that time; and lest my arrears should prove too much for me I will, without further delay, proceed to discharge, however briefly, the duties devolving, upon a faithful, if "tant soit peu," unpunctual correspondent.

Imprimis there was the usual annual performance of the Messiah at the Town Hall by the Festival Choral Society, with Madame Florence Lancia, Mdlle. Enriquez, Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Lewis Thomas as principals. That the Hall was literally crammed to repletion was only to be expected, but that so indifferent a rendering of Handel's familiar work on the part of the chorus (the band never is efficient) should have been given was not to be expected, but such is the fact nevertheless. Comments have been freely expressed in more than one quarter, and explanations or excuses have not been wanting, their purport being that a number of comparatively untrained vocalists have been recently introduced into the choir, and, as a consequence, unsteadiness both of time and tune have resulted. Whatever be the cause, the Society should see to it and effect a remedy as promptly as may be, Birmingham having a character to lose in the matter of chorus singing. Yet another question might be studied with advantage by this useful body, and that is a little more attention in the matter of pronunciation, more particularly of the aspirates. "'Oo his the King of Glory, 'e his the King of Glory, the Lord of 'osts" does not fall pleasantly on the ear when heard only once; certainly does not gain by repetition.

The principals gave satisfaction in the solo parts, although Mdme. Florence Lancia seemed rather out of voice, and at times somewhat overweighted, a remark that would apply with equal justice to the lady who undertook the contralto music. Mr. Lewis Thomas sang like the practised artist that he is, and produced a proportionate effect upon his audience, who would fain have demanded a repetition of "Why do the nations" and "The trumpet shall sound," the obbligato accompaniment to which was played by Mr. Thomas Harper, with all that fullness and beauty of tone, combined with unerring mechanism, which have so long stamped him as the first living professor of his instrument. To hear Mr. Sims Reeves sing the whole of the tenor music of the Messiah does not now fall often to one's lot, and though the two best known airs may command the sympathies of the largest number, it is in the "Passions" that Mr. Reeves proves himself incontestably the greatest artist who has ever sung Handel's touching and pathetic music—music which must go straight to the heart of all who have ears to hear and feeling to understand, no matter what their religion may be. Although I have listened to Mr. Reeves' singing of this for more years than I care to remember, yet the effect upon this occasion was as impressive as ever, and a higher test than that of frequent repetition can hardly be adopted.

On the 8th January, Mr. Russell gave his second concert with Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington and Signor Foli as principal vocalists, Dr. Swinnerton Heap as solo pianist, the band of Mr. de Jong of Manchester, completing the attractions. The overture to Masaniello, Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony" (C major), overture to Guillaume Tell, Schubert's Entr'acte from Rosamunde, and Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," were the pieces set down for the orchestra, who moreover accompanied two movements (if so much, why not more?) Adagio and Rondo from Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, played with spirit and refinement by Dr. Heap. Although not full, the hall was better attended than at the first concert of Mr. Russell, who now announces the third for an early date in February, with Mdlle. Tietjens, and some other members of Mr. Mapleson's touring party in addition to Mr. de Jong's Band.

Messrs. Harrison's Second Chamber Concert unfortunately fell on the same evening as the Conversazione of the Midland Institute, and to this circumstance may be attributed the somewhat limited audience at the Masonic Hall, where a programme, excellent in every respect, was set forth. Works and artists are alike so well known that to name them is sufficient. Quartet in E flat, Haydn; Fantasie-Sonata in G, Schubert (for piano); Mendelssohn's Posthumous Quartet, and Beethoven's Trio in E flat, executed by Madame Norman-Néruda, Messrs. Ries, Straus, Daubert, and Charles Hallé, all of whom played in a manner which left nothing to desire. Mdme. Barton Edmunds, who is now a resident of Birmingham, made her first appearance here since her marriage, and won much favour by her singing of Handel's "As when the dove" (Acis and Galatea), and Arne's "When daisies pied" (the latter encored), and a song of Balfe's substituted.

At the second concert of the Birmingham Musical Union the scheme included Schubert's Quartet in D minor, Op. 161, Impromptu in A flat, No. 4, Op. 90, of the same composer, for pianoforte alone; Beethoven's Sonata in A major, Op. 47, better known as the Kreutzer, for pianoforte and violin; J. S. Bach's Chaconne in D minor, for violin alone; and Mendelssohn's always welcome trio in the same key. The string executants were Messrs. Straus, Bernhardt, Hann, and Vieuxtemps, all of whom acquitted themselves to admiration, the first-named gentleman also winning loud and deserved applause for his wonderful mastery of Bach's difficult Chaconne, and Dr. Heap showing himself an able exponent of the pianoforte music, whether solo or concerted. Although the snow lay some inches thick, and the night was of the most inclement, Messrs. Adams and Beresford's room was well filled, which says something for the good taste of one section of the Birmingham public. As each of the entrepreneurs already named has two more concerts announced, the Black Country (so-called) is not likely to lack good music for a while.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

On Tuesday evening of last week, the Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society gave a concert in the Queen's Rooms. The programme was an excellent one, and included Cherubini's overture to Lodoiska; Gounod's Faust (ballet music); Mozart's Symphony in D, No. 1; and Reissiger's overture to Yelva. The performance was one of the most extraordinary I ever listened to, and it was unkind of the fates to constrain me in the way of duty to sit out two such hours. It should be understood that the Society, though an amateur one, charges its supporters an annual subscription, and that the Press is asked to give criticisms of the performances. At the concert in question, there were several professionals (unacknowledged in the programmes), picked up from different establishments in the city. The result was, that during the whole evening, unless in passages for strings alone, the orchestra was never once in perfect tune, which, added to unsteadiness of time, produced, every now and again, novel and startling effects. The conductor, M. Méhul, cannot be congratulated on this extraordinary public exhibition. In a great measure he is responsible for the result indicated, because, as I have pointed out in your columns before, his beat is neither distinct nor steady Mr. Duncan Smyth, a local basso, who has just returned from studying in Italy, sang several songs with good effect, the accompaniments to which were admirably played by Mr. Emile Berger.

THE LATE LORD LYTTON.

(From an occasional Contributor.)

Yesterday (Jan. 29), Lord Lytton died—until then reigning prince of English literature, having shared the throne during the lives of Dickens and Thackeray. No three men of their generation have exercised such powerful influence for good over the age and art of which they were such eminent representatives; they were all so different and all so great, Lord Lytton being the eldest if not the greatest of the Triad.

What a happy time he must have passed, living in a world of his own creation, he, the sun of his own system, giving light and life to the creations of his own imagination—working to the last day of his existence, and exercising his fancy and his pen as vividly and powerfully as at the commencement of his career.

Sixty-eight years he had of working life, unceasing labour and success, correcting the last proofs, the day before he died, of a new novel recently finished. All he did he did completely, as far as human energy and care could approach perfection.

The only personal recollection I have of him is of the occasion of the dinner given to Charles Dickens previous to his departure for America, when Lord Lytton, as representative of the highest class of English literature, so gracefully took the chair. His fellow student in early days at College, the Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, had to propose his health at the termination of the proceedings; and I shall never forget the eloquent terms in which he did it, or the enthusiasm he called forth, which was almost equally divided between the object of the speech and the speaker. He spoke of their college days when he prognosticated great things of Bulwer, who had since achieved a world-wide fame as "poet, novelist, scholar, statesman, critic, dramatist, and thinker." That ever-to-be-remembered dinner, in the minds of those who had the happiness to be present, attracted the highest representatives of every phase of art—literature, painting, music, and the stage. The most illustrious men of the day were on the roll to drink to the hero of the evening; but the honours were shared by the noble chairman and the Lord Chief Justice.

I would scarcely have the effect of that evening effaced from my mind, or exchanged for any other pleasant recollection of my life—so bright is the spot it occupies.

The Musical World.
LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1873.

IN noticing the concert given, on Wednesday, by the newly-formed Amateur Orchestral Society, a daily contemporary remarked as follows upon the appearance, among the first violins, of Her Majesty's second son:—

"Could the noble letter-writer who warned his son against fiddlers and fiddling have emerged from the family vault and looked in at Albert Hall, last evening, he would have seen a sight adapted to make every hair in his courtly wig stand on end. There, on the orchestra, were gentlemen of birth and breeding by the score, including at least one earl and an 'honourable,' armed with all manner of instruments, and fiddling or blowing away as though for dear life, while a brilliant and distinguished company looked on with approbation. But Lord Chesterfield would have seen more, because prominent among the first violins was a Prince of the Blood—his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh. What thoughts of national catastrophe such a spectacle would have created in the mind of the author of the famous letters it boots not to inquire. We can readily imagine his seeking the shortest way back to the repose and safety of the tomb. But times and men have changed since Lord Chesterfield wrote; and the world has learned to approve much that once called forth its displeasure. As to distinguished musical amateurs, they have long been plentiful as flowers in May, if not always quite so agreeable to the sense. Yet we think it may safely be said that never till last night did an English audience assemble in a public place to witness the performance of an English Prince. All the greater honour belongs to the Duke of Edinburgh for having set up a noble precedent, and demonstrated his belief in the fact that the highest rank need not be ashamed of devotion to a heaven-sent art. It seemed an easy thing, that appearance, fiddle in hand, upon the Albert Hall orchestra, but none the less was it a brave act; and, if there were a Victoria Cross for courage in the fight against tradition and prejudice, His Royal Highness would be entitled to wear it among the worthiest. Except that he sat at the leading desk, the Duke was not to be distinguished from the ninety-two fiddlers who were his associates; nor was he singled out for any demonstration whatever. That he remained the 'observed of all observers,' need not be said, and we are sure that many who studied the phenomenon of a royal violinist learnt the old lesson, 'Whatsoever thy hand findest to do, do it with all thy might.'"

These observations record in fitting terms an event which is certainly without precedent on English soil; and in view of it, as well as in contemplation of possible results, we might easily do a worse thing than give it special notice. What if the apparition of "our sailor Prince" as first violin in an orchestra illustrate the Darwinian theory of development and natural selection? The Duke inherits a large aggregation of musical tendencies both from his Mother and Father. The House of Hanover, for example, has always been more or less attached to the "divine art." George I., when merely a German Elector, valued Handel enough to take offence because the master ran away to England; and, when King of England, the charms of the "Water Music" were scarcely needed to bring monarch and composer together again. How steadily George II. befriended the author of the Messiah nobody needs to be told; and, as for George III., he lives in musical history the central figure of two very different scenes:—one which shows him rising to his feet, half in admiration, half in awe, as the "Hallelujah" first fell upon his ears; and another, sketched by Thackeray, which shows him seated, in a passing moment of sanity, at the organ, and touching its keys, while tears rolled from his sightless eyes. The "first gentleman in Europe" was an amateur violoncellist, and had as firm a conviction of his ability upon that instrument as he had of his personal valour at Waterloo; while the cultivated musicianship of our present Gracious Sovereign is well known to all her subjects. Whether the ancestors of the late Prince Consort were worthy, as regards art, of their illustrious descendant, history sayeth not; but the present Duke of Saxe-Coburg is a composer of distinction, and his lamented brother shared with him, not only a love for music, but also great practical ability. The Duke of Edinburgh inherits both the predilections and the powers of his family, and the result is, as though wrought out by the action of irresistible forces, his appearance among fiddlers—a fiddler himself.

The contemporary, whose words we have just quoted, speaks of the Duke's début as an act of bravery, and so it unquestionably deserves to be considered. In no civilized country are class distinctions more rigidly respected than in England, and nowhere is there a greater horror of doing anything which the "set" of the doer might look upon as infra dig. This state of things is not confined to what Thackeray's Jeames used to call the "hupper suckles," but may be found quite as rampant in lower social grades. Miss Tippets, for example, the retired green-grocer's daughter, will attend the private practice of the Little Poppleton Choral Society, but the idea of appearing at the annual concert, side by side with milliners' apprentices and "sich like," is annually scouted with lofty scorn. But Miss Tippets, bursting the bonds of "retired" gentility, and condescending to appear in public, would be nothing as a phenomenon compared to the apparition of a Royal Prince upon an orchestra. The Duke has shown himself a brave man, and he was never more royal than when he took fiddle in hand on Wednesday evening. Pride and exclusiveness have received a lesson not easy to forget, and our only fear is that the lesson will be learnt too well—that everybody with any claim to "respectability" will seize some instrument or other, and incontinently rush upon platforms, in emulation of the royal exemplar.

TO TIGER.

(On his coming of age.)

I nurs'd thee in thy infant years
With many cares and some few tears,
When of thy death I had grave fears,
My Tiger.

What anxious nights and weary days
With thee I spent—'tis to thy praise,
I sing them now in heartfelt lays,
My Tiger.

For thou wert sometimes good and kind,
And only snapped when in the mind,
Or physic made thee so inclined,
My Tiger.

In lusty youth, thy temper hot,
By none can ever be forgot,
Who shar'd with thee in scot and lot,
My Tiger.

And oft thou'st caused an anguish'd heart
By drawing from thy friends apart,
Till thieves were thought of with a start,
My Tiger.

Whate'er thy fault, thy pretty tricks,
Thy agile dance, thy loving licks,
Have sav'd thee from avenging sticks,
My Tiger.

But now thou'st come to dog's estate,
Get wisdom in thy curly pate,
And gravity, ere 'tis too late,
My Tiger.

In hope of this we drink thy health,
And wish for thee all canine wealth,
By fair means gain'd and not by stealth,
My Tiger.

INNSBRUCK.—The Innsbruck Musical Union commenced its present season with a programme comprising exclusively music by Mendelssohn—a mark of pious respect for the great musician who died five-and-twenty years ago. The first piece was the Symphony in A major, No. 4, Op 90, given for the first time here. Then followed the two mixed choruses, "Im Walde," and "Auf dem See." The concert wound up with Die erste Walpurgisnacht. The solo music was sung by Mdlle. Füsalberger, Herren Schöpfer, and Billunger. The whole performance went off admirably under the direction of the energetic conductor, Herr Nagiller. Mendelssohn's Elijah is to be performed in the spring.

CAIRO.—Signore Stolz and Waldmann have been engaged for the approaching Italian Operatic season.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

FROM local sources we derive that the Rubinstein concert tour in America has been a pecuniary failure, and that the house of Steinway and Co., pianoforte manufacturers, will be mulcted in a grave amount of dollars. This is pitiable. If Rubinstein, backed by Steinway and Co., is a pecuniary failure, what, in the name of the "Fratres Helenæ" ("lucida sidera"), may any other pianist expect? O Gemini!—Explain, O Watson—the unbending!

WE read the following in the New York Arcadian, (No. 18, Volume I.,) one of the most bumptious of the representatives of very young Yankeedom:—

"When the theatrical managers recently held a meeting, and agreed to reduce their advertisements in the daily papers to ten lines, we supposed the matter would stop there; but now the managers of the daily papers purpose to hold a meeting and discuss the advisability of cutting down the amusement notices to ten lines. So there is every prospect of a new and novel contest of cut and come again."

We presume that, from a financial point of view, the managers of the New York theatres are acting for the best, their own interests considered. But of one thing we feel convinced, that the reduction to "ten lines" of the theatrical and operatic criticisms (say, in nineteen papers out of twenty,) would be a priceless benefit to all the readers of the Union.

A GENTLEMAN has just discovered, at a second-hand dealer's, in Brussels, some band parts of Jean Jacques Rousseau's monodrama, Pygmalion, which was set to music by Coignet. It was first produced on the 30th October, 1775, at the Théâtre Français, where it achieved a great success, and was a stock-piece for several years. Rousseau was accused of having laid claim to be the composer of Coignet's music, just as he did in the case of Le Devin du Village. This charge is supported by M. Castil Blaze among others. That gentleman says that Coignet was originally engaged in commercial pursuits at Lyons, but that, having failed, he went to Paris, with a view of retrieving his fortunes, by turning to account his musical talent. He had not been long in the capital before he published the music to Pygmalion. But Rousseau had composed two pieces, Nos. 2 and 10, and, at the head of these, Coignet wrote: "This Andante is by M. Rousseau." The first of the two is introduced into the Overture, while the other forms a part of the Introduction. It is these two pieces which have just been discovered.

THE Fifth Avenue Journal says:—

"The Brooklyn Philharmonic made an effort to secure the services of Rubinstein, undoubtedly the greatest of the pianists who have visited this country. A thousand dollars for a single concert was the price asked. The number of lawyers, eminent divines, or any other men or women who could command this sum for a single evening or day's performance may be counted on the fingers of one hand, and the number of managers who could ask it with the expectation of receiving it could be easily accommodated in a single bed. It is scarcely necessary to add that the society retains the thousand dollars for other investment."

How long will writers on this subject make stale and unprofitable comparisons between the salaries of artists and those of other professions. There is positively no argument in such a course. Artists get what the public think them worth, and so do lawyers and divines; if the latter get less than artists so much the worse for them.

IN view of the not improbable continued burning of the leading places of amusement in America, the demand for front seats at the theatres has greatly lessened. Most applicants at the box offices inquire for seats as near the door as possible, and we hear that the scale of prices is to be re-adjusted to suit this new caprice of the public—the orchestra stalls to remain unreserved for late and venturesome comers, and the rear chairs to command the premium. Ticket speculators have already yielded to the new idea as to what are the choice places in an auditorium.

AT the funeral of the late Lord Lytton, which was celebrated on Saturday, in Westminster, among the many distinguished persons present to do honour to the illustrious dead, was Sir Sterndale Bennett; so that music, if not poetry, was worthily represented.

PROVINCIAL.

PENZANCE.—Israel in Egypt is shortly to be given in St. John's Hall, on a large scale. The chorus will be composed of members of the Camborne and Penzance choral societies. Conductor, Mr. John H. Nunn, M.A., R.E.

MANCHESTER.—With reference to a concert given by Mr. Charles Hallé, on January 23rd, the Examiner and Times said:—

"The idea of an opera recital is not new in Manchester—and not the least brilliant pages of the chronicles of Mr. Hallé's past seasons are those which record the production of Gluck's Iphigénia in Taurus, Armida and Orpheus—nor was last night the first time that operatic music by Mozart was consecutively heard in the Free Trade Hall, as, many years ago, Mr. Hallé conducted a portion, if not the whole, of Don Giovanni. But with the exception of the introduction of a portion of William Tell, at the Rossini memorial concert, we have heard nothing of the kind in Manchester for a very long time, and the happy idea of giving a recital of the Nozze di Figaro had therefore all the charm of novelty. The selection of this popular work was in many respects judicious; it is of course impossible to obtain a perfectly adequate idea of the composer's meaning; especially is it difficult to convey a due sense of the humour of the most amusing situations without stage action, costumes, &c.; and it is also true that the complicated intrigues of the book of this opera do not permit the hearer to obtain so vivid an idea of the plot without witnessing an actual representation, as the simpler actions of the librettos of some other lyric dramas would. But, on the other hand, the inherent charm of the music of the Nozze di Figaro is so great that, by itself, it never fails to give pleasure; and we know few operas which a blind man might enjoy with such slight comparative disadvantage as Mozart's Nozze. The fact, too, that all the principal airs, duets, &c., enjoy undiminished favour as concert-room pieces, is an evidence of the intrinsically fascinating character of this music. How splendidly Mdlle. Tietjens can sing the music of the Countess, Manchester amateurs have had many opportunities of knowing. Madame Sinico, who is well remembered here as a very engaging and graceful Susanna, was in very good voice, and throughout the evening she exerted herself with unfailing energy. Mdlle. Macvitz, who made her first appearance in Manchester, has a voice of great power, beauty, and expressiveness; but, unfortunately, nervousness and want of complete acquaintance with the music prevented her doing anything like justice to it. We shall certainly hear Mdlle. Macvitz again with pleasure. Mdlle. Bauermeister was, as usual, careful and painstaking. As Figaro, Signor Agnesi achieved, perhaps, the greatest vocal success of the evening. Signor Campobello had a part far more attractive musically than histrionically. His voice is very pleasing. He had evidently made a careful study of the music, and his singing of 'Io sospiro" well deserved the hearty applause awarded to it. Mr. Hallé certainly deserves the thanks of his subscribers for providing so great a musical enjoyment."

VIENNA.—The first novelty this year will be the Hamlet of M. Ambroise Thomas, which had been temporarily laid aside to make way for Signor Verdi's Aida. The latter is, for certain pecuniary reasons, not to be produced. The negotiations had been successfully carried on with Signor Ricordi, of Milan, when, at the last moment, it was stipulated a sine quâ non by that gentleman, that Verdi was to superintend the last few rehearsals and conduct the first performance. He further demanded the sum of one thousand pounds sterling for Signor Verdi's travelling expenses and professional services. Signor Ricordi was informed that neither Meyerbeer nor Gounod had accepted or demanded any indemnification under similar circumstances, but the management offered eighty pounds. Signor Ricordi was given up to the 22nd December last to answer; and, as no answer came, the management considered the negotiations at an end.—The last engagement at the Imperial Operahouse is that of Herr Scaria, the bass singer from Dresden. He is to receive an annual salary of one thousand pounds, with three hundred pounds additional, if he sings barytone in addition to bass parts.—The fifth Philharmonic concert opened with Mendelssohn's overture to Athalie. This was followed by five Symphonic Pieces for Orchestra, entitled collectively, Melusine. The composer is Herr Julius Zellner. Critics differ greatly in their estimate of the merit of the new production. The concert concluded with Schumann's Symphony in D minor.

WARSAW.— M. Godebski, the son-in-law of Servais, the violoncello virtuoso, is getting on very rapidly with the statue of Chopin, which will now soon be completed. The idea of erecting a monument to the Polish composer, in this his native land, was started by a number of his admirers here and elsewhere. Among them were Prince Orloff, Count Berg, Countess Dziatinska, (before her marriage, Princess Czartoryska), the Princess Chimay, the Marchioness of Nosilles (who is a Pole), and the Countess de Mercy-Argeesteau.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

In an article published by the Oxford Times, of Dec. 28th, with reference to a Christmas performance of the Messiah (on the Monday preceding Christmas Day), there is a notice of the singing of Miss Sophie Ferrari, which we have much pleasure in quoting, entertaining, as we do, a firm belief that this young lady will obtain a high rank in her profession:—

"The announcement that the soprano and contralto solos would be sustained by the Misses Ferrari (the accomplished daughters of the late Signor Ferrari) left no doubt as to their perfect rendering. A more thoroughly competent exponent of oratorio music than Miss S. Ferrari, we do not wish to hear, her style throughout was as unaffected as it was pure and devout. She especially distinguished herself in the nativity recitatives. The florid air of 'Rejoice greatly,' and the sublime 'I know that my Redeemer liveth;' this latter was encored, the delicacy and perfection of the reading having such an effect on the audience as to prove irresistible."

Miss Francesca Ferrari being indisposed, the contralto music was entrusted to Miss Meadows, who, as well as Mr. Robson (tenor), and Mr. Lambert (bass), are well spoken of by the Oxford Times, which also praises the chorus and orchestra (Mr. Burnett being leading violin).

The following very sensible observations appear in an article printed in the Oxford Times, apropos of a performance of the Messiah, about the detestable system of encores—to which singers, Alboni, Sims Reeves, and one or two others excepted, always womanfully or manfully resist according to the power which is given them:—

"There is a class of concert-goers who are in the habit of encoring not only ballads but also separate portions of concerted music, and in many cases even choruses, solos in the course of the oratorios, and cantatas of the great masters. In the first place, the repetition of any one movement in a sonata or symphony, or of any solo or chorus in an oratorio, destroys at once the entire symmetry of the composition. The due amount of repetition necessary for the development of the composer's idea is indicated by himself (and in the case of the song in question would it be treason to suggest that it is already somewhat spun out?) and when the wind has thus been sufficiently worked upon it is necessary to proceed at once to the movement next in order, if the effect of the work is not to be damaged. In fact all applause between separate movements is simply injurious, and we hope the day is not far distant when, in sacred music at least, all applause will be abolished, and there will be nothing to interfere with a thorough enjoyment of the composer's work. In the second place, the repetition of a song invariably falls flat upon the ears, even of those who have most vehemently demanded it. The feelings have been only gradually wound up to their highest tension during the performance, and it is psychologically impossible to let them down at once to their original calm condition from which they were aroused by the welcome melody, just as it is impossible to keep them strung up to the state to which they were wrought by the climax."

[With every word of which we conscientiously agree.]

MY DARLING'S ROSES.

(Copyright.)

I know a garden, large and rare,
And day by day my love walked there,
A Queen among the roses.
She woo'd her flow'rs with beauty's eyes,
My suit I urged with anxious sighs
And tender speech of posies.

I told the flow'rs my dear intent,
Their heads the pretty blossoms bent,
As though 'twere chilling weather.
"Nay, nay," they cried, "our lady fair,
"Can for no other garden care,
We bloom and fade together."

The winter came, my darling died,
And stricken roses mournful sighed,
"There's no one left to love us!"
Fresh flow'rs now make the garden gay,
And oft I, joyful, hear them say,
"The Queen Rose blooms above us."

LONDON GREGORIAN CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—The musical practices of the London Gregorian Choral Association leave little to be desired. But we are anxiously waiting to receive our directions as to ritual. May I suggest that, in the procession, the arm-swingers go first, the hand-pocketers next, after them the inside-edge-cutters, and lastly the Grecian bend men? Some eight of our own choir had intended to come; but I am afraid that our simple and steady walking will form too ridiculous a contrast to that of the majority. Perhaps we had better stay away. G. H. ADAMS.

WAIFS.

Mr. John Barnett has returned to Cheltenham.

Mr. Jacques Blumenthal has returned to town from Italy.

M. de Kontski proposes to give some concerts in Paris next March.

A new theatrical journal, L'Emporio Teatrale, has been started at Florence.

M. Gounod's Romeo et Juliette was successfully brought out last week at the Opéra Comique.

M. Gevaert has taken the deceased Mercadante's place as Foreign Associate of the Brussels Academy of Fine Arts.

Messrs Steinway & Sons and the Messrs. Chickering have decided to be represented by their pianos at the Vienna Exposition.

Madame Pauline Lucca, having paid the fine imposed on account of the breach of her Berlin engagement, is now free from all connection with the German capital.

Sir Michael Costa's Naaman is announced to be given by the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society, for the first time, on Thursday, at the Midland Counties Musical Festival, which is to be held at Nottingham next week.

An enthusiastic dramatic critic says of a popular actress that "when she ran out to meet her lover, she carried the whole of the audience with her." Quite an arm full.

The Festival of the Lower Rhine will take place this year at Aix-la-Chapelle, under the direction of Herr Julius Rietz. Israel in Egypt will be performed on the first day.

The Fishmongers' Company have established two Scholarships, of £25 a-year, to be obtained by competition in the National Training School of Music, which the Society of Arts is organizing.

The American impresario, Mr. Daly, has signed for a new opera bouffé with Offenbach. Schneider and Theresa are engaged for the work, which will be produced at New York during the season of 1873-4.

At Venice a flute player, M. Aloysio, exhibited a new model for a violin. The strings are made of metal, and pass entirely around the drum. The sound is said to have four times the sonority of an ordinary violin.

The Boston Chorus will begin their second series of oratorio rehearsals at Bumstead Hall, Wednesday evening, January 8. So much interest has been awakened in the rehearsal of The Woman of Samaria, that the practice of this work will be continued.

SOUTH KENSINGTON.—It is understood that when, in April next, Mr. Henry Cole retires from the post he has so long held at South Kensington, General Scott will succeed him as Secretary. Mr. Cole will undertake the management of the London International Exhibitions.

The Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's are about to erect a choir school, in which the choristers will be boarded as well as educated. Until it is completed one of the canons' houses has been lent for the purpose; but, as its accommodation is limited, the full number of choristers cannot be received until the school is completed, which will probably be towards the end of next year.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL AMATEUR ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.—The first private evening concert took place on Wednesday evening at 8.30 p.m., in the Royal Albert Hall. The orchestra numbered above 160 performers. The programme included the overtures to Zanetta and Egmont, Haydn's Military Symphony, No. 11, the March from the Prophète, and one or two vocal pieces.

There was a rumour during the week that Max Strakosch had made arrangements to give a short spring season of Italian opera at the Academy, and had telegraphed to Europe for artists. The latter part of this story is absurd enough. If Strakosch gives a short season of opera, it will be to afford the Americans a last opportunity of seeing Mario on the lyric stage.—New York Arcadian.

Herr Rubinstein met Mr. Thomas at Steinway's the other day, after the first rehearsal with the orchestra. The Russian was in great glee and exclaimed, "You have put my head on my shoulders again, which I lost when I first came here." It is a fact, according to the Fifth Avenue Journal, that the pianist has regained not only his "head" but his spirits since thrown into the artistic atmosphere of the only orchestra outside of Europe.

Mr. C. L. Gruneison, who has recently visited Brussels with a view of collecting information as to the working of the Conservatoire of Music, and the system of State subsidies and municipal grants to promote musical education, had an audience of the King of the Belgians at the Palace on Thursday last. His Majesty kindly gave directions to the Government departments to afford Mr. Gruneison every assistance to obtain the official returns connected with the Legislative support given for the cultivation of music in Belgium.

Mdlle. Louise Liebhart is an "Imperial blonde," and is a married lady. She possesses, without exception, the largest and most expensive wardrobe of any professional in this country or Europe. Her dresses are more numerous and more costly than even those of Nilsson, and at the recent Lucca reception she was conceded to be the best dressed woman present. Apropos, the lady is an intimate personal friend of Lucca, who has repeatedly called upon her at her rooms at the Belvidere. Mademoiselle, or rather Madame Liebhart, is a thorough woman of the world, speaks all the modern languages, including English, and is of a very lively disposition. She is specially addicted to French novels and diamonds, but cares little for dancing. Unlike Lucca, she never sings, or even hums a song in private, reserving all her music for the public ear.—The New Orleans Sunday News.

Musical criticism seems in a bad way in Dublin, if we may credit the Irish Builder, who discourses thus vigorously upon the subject:—

"Let the fact, then, be made known for the hundredth time, that the musical and dramatic critiques in our daily papers are dishonest, shameful, utterly unworthy, and a scandal to journalism and Ireland! Praise is lavishly dispensed because the system pays, and the evil may be traced to two or three principal causes—'free orders,' long and repeated advertisements, and personal and private influences. Some of these fulsome notices that appear are in substance supplied by the actors, actresses, and singers themselves or their personal friends; and all of them may with truth be said to be written to order. Let this fact be known also: there is not a second daily newspaper in this city—and we say it with a feeling of regret—that has a bonâ fide musical, dramatic, or fine-art critic on its staff. The majority of these so-called critics are ordinary penny-a-liners—a very active and industrious class of gentlemen, no doubt, but who have to be unscrupulous in their statements that they may live. If these very industrious gentlemen can create a sensation or make a hit in their 'slap-dash' notices, so much the better for themselves and their employers. 'A full house' on Saturday night will procure a longer advertisement on Monday morning, another 'free pass' all round, and a hobnob perhaps with Signor, Senora, Herr Bugle, Madame, or Mademoiselle. If the latter delightful introductions are accomplished, your enthralled penny-a-liner will revel and luxuriate in his delightful description of the singing or acting in his next notice. Ask his private opinion, however, over a friendly glass-away from the precincts of the theatre, most likely he will honestly blurt out: '— rot,' 'wretched trash, 'pon my soul it is.' Our soi-disant critic is quite right, but he will not unlikely add—'the public swallow it; it goes down, and I have earned two 'quids' by it, and hope to earn several more.'"

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—In your last number you were pleased to announce that I am engaged for an operatic tour in the United States; will you be good enough to give it the most unqualified contradiction, having no intention of accepting any engagement in America, or of leaving England.—I remain, Sir, your very obedient servant,

January 30th, 1873. J. NORDBLOM (Tenor Singer).

MUNICH.—From the usual annual report just issued for the past year, 1872, by the management of the Royal Opera, we learn that, during the twelvemonth, there were three novelties, Medea (proh pudor!) Cherubini; Theodor Körner, Weissheimer; and Der Dorfadvokat, R. von Hornstein. The revivals were eight in number, La Part du Diable and Le Domino Noir, Auber; L'Africaine and Robert le Diable, Meyerbeer; Der fliegende Holländer and Tristan und Isolde, R. Wagner; Die Schweizerfamilie, Weigl; and Les Noces de Jeannette, Massé. With regard to the number of performances for each composer, Herr Richard Wagner, of course, headed the poll with 21; for is not this city the residence of King Louis of Bavaria, the great patron of the Musician of the Future? Then came Auber, Lortzing, and Weber, with 9 each; Meyerbeer and Rossini, with 8 each; Gounod, with 7; Beethoven and Mozart, with 6 each; Flotow, Hornstein, Marschner, Méhul, and Schubert, with 4 each; Adam, Boieldieu, Cherubini, Gluck, Holstein, and Verdi, with 3 each; David, Donizetti, Nicolai, Spohr, and Weissheimer, with 2 each; and Grétry, Halévy, Maillart, Massé, and Weigl, with 1 each.

LEIPSIC.—Herr Nachbaur, from the Royal Opera, Munich, whom the Berlin Echo designates "an artist with little voice and training, but a good deal of puff," will give a series of performances at the Stadttheater. He will appear in Il Trovatore, Die Meistersinger, La Dame Blanche, Lohengrin, and other operas.

BRESLAU.—At the sixth Concert of the Orchestral Union, the programme contained Robert Schumann's Symphony in C major, and a novelty in the shape of a Concert-Overture, entitled "Normannenfahrt." The composer is Herr Albert Dietrich, who impressed the public with a favourable idea of his ability by a Symphony of his, performed at last year's series of concerts. The new work is full of noisy instrumentation, suggestive enough, no doubt, to willing minds and ears, of warlike incidents and of stormy sea-waves, but not more particularly characteristic of Norman than of Iberian, Gallic, or Moslem warriors. In fact, properly to appreciate all the beauties, and duly to understand the significance of this Concert-Overture, the audience must carefully recollect the title: "Normannenfahrt" ("Passage of the Normans"), and then, like Dick Swiveller's friend, the Marchioness, "make believe" very strenuously. Another important item in the programme was Franz Schubert's March in B minor. Mdlle. Leonore von Bretfield, from the Stadttheater, was the vocalist. She sang the cavatina, "Glöcklein im Thale," from Weber's Euryanthe; "Im Herbst," Robert Franz; "Die Nachtigall," B. Scholz; and "Frühling Liebster," idem.

NAPLES.—A new three-act comic opera, Il Cuoco, has been successfully produced at the Teatro Rossini. The music is by a young composer, Sig. d'Arienzo. The libretto is founded upon Scribe's Vaudeville of Le Secrétaire, familiar to English playgoers as A Fish out of Water.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.

Price 12s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine, (Longman & Co.,) they are strongly recommended at pages 672 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from, Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION.

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country. The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. VAN PRAAG.

MR. VAN PRAAG, who has been for many years past well known to the members of the Musical Profession, and the public, as holding a responsible position at the Principal Concert-rooms of the West End, is now, in his 74th year, and left without the means of sustenance and support. In addition to his failing health and strength, he has also recently become a widower, and is, by this sad bereavement, left alone, with not a relative in England to aid or take care of him. He has children in California who wish him to go out to them, and it is his own desire, notwithstanding his age and infirmities, to do so. Want of means for undertaking so long and expensive a journey, which his children are unable to supply, however, preclude the possibility of his leaving England. Under these sad circumstances, a few friends, well able to bear witness to his respectability, honesty, and courtesy in the discharge of the duties he has so "well and worthily fulfilled," are anxious to raise a Subscription in his behalf, to which contributions are earnestly and respectfully requested.

WORDS BY WM. HENDERSON. (SONG.) MUSIC BY EMILE BERGER.

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May! What joys attend thine advent gay

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May!
What joys attend thine advent gay!
On every tree the birdies sing,
From hill and dale glad echoes ring;
The lark, inspir'd, to Heav'n ascends,
The gurgling brook in beauty wends
By mossy bank and grassy brae,
Where violets bloom and lambkins play.
Delightful Spring—sweet month of May
What joys attend thine advent gay!

THE STONE GUEST, A POSTHUMOUS OPERA BY DARGOMIJSKI.

By W. von Lenz.

The Russian composer, Dargomijski, a man of talent who pursued his own path independently of Glinka, left behind him the sketches of a score, treating in a perfectly novel manner, for the Russian lyric stage, Puschkin's celebrated fragmentary play of The Stone Guest. Inspired by a spirit of genuine patriotic devotion for their task, S. Guy (author of Ratcliff, and the first writer on the musical press in Russia) arranged and completed the sketches, while Rimsky-Korssakow, who is professor at the Conservatory, scored them in a masterly manner. After surmounting great obstacles with the most disinterested zeal, these admirers of the artist, so prematurely snatched away, produced the work at the Russian Opera previous to Passion Week. A skilful pianoforte arrangement has been published by Bessel, St. Petersburgh. In the arrangement, and in the bills, the work is called a three-act opera. In order, however, that we may be in a proper position to judge it, we must above all things remark that, intentionally, and on principle, it does not agree with the signification attached to the term: opera. Speaking popularly, "in the complete pianoforte arrangement, there is neither anything to sing nor anything to play; there is only Puschkin's poem to read, with chords, progressions, and figures in the recitative style underneath." We perceive a three-act recitative, and it is a matter of doubt whether the dramatic action would gain anything by the music, and prove superior if represented in this form, to what it would be if declaimed in the ordinary way. Every scenic representation most decidedly loses something of its intelligibility, and of its impressiveness, whenever the music, which supports it on the basis of the given dramatic idea, possesses no intrinsic value, the possession of such a value being a vital condition for all dramatic music, whatever the name given it. Whenever verses intended for the stage are intoned by a singer, without the act of intonation growing into a melody possessing value and significance, the result will be a cross between declamation and musical intonation; in other words, a split, robbing the words of the effect most peculiar to them, and the music of its independence, and the impression it produces by melodic invention (melodic style). Never was the rhythm more subordinated to the words, never did the latter enjoy to such a degree all their rights as to quantity, cæsura, and correct accent in the musical characters, while, combined with all this, there are now and then charming specimens of melismas; but they never grow into melody, into a rounded theme, duly worked out (a motive). Such are the character and style of the work, the only exception being the short romance, episodically introduced, of Laura (one of Don Juan's victims), who, at the urgent request of her admirers, takes up her lute, and we involuntarily regret that the exception is not the rule, so charming is it, and so much in keeping with the situation. The rhythmus and the style are that of a cachucha, though here, as elsewhere, the harmonic and modulatory supports and their masterly turns predominate. The composition of the work dates from the time when among ourselves, also, Richard Wagner's theories found an echo in practical and active minds, and when opera was forthwith to become musical drama, which every opera worthy of the name always had been. The Wagnerian precepts maintain their good and logical right upon paper, inasmuch as they cut out of opera everything formal, and all set models, and, for the purpose of doing due justice to the dramatic notion, free the words from the traditional musical fetters. These theories have not been rendered by Wagner a reality; the leading principle of an absolute blending of words and music has not been carried out by him, and still less by his followers in the path of musical realism; the theory must finally miscarry from the impossibility of fashioning identically the words to the music and the music to the words! What advantage, we ask, could accrue to the words? Illusion, or poetical deception, is not unattended with difficulties of its own upon the stage; these are respected when the words are musically fashioned, without the process leading to what is understood by vocal-music, by which we mean something that by no means abrogates the significance of the words, but has rather created a peculiar kind of drama, to which, if satisfying the dramatic conditions of the case, we might give the name of opera. If a composer, however, restricts himself to recitative, to short phrases, laconically supported or interrupted by the orchestra, the words thus delivered in recitative, instead of being recited, are necessarily less intelligible, and constitute only a melodrama, which, though not wanting in purpose, can lay no claim to illusion.

What is it, then, which, after the lapse of a century, still so deeply affects and charms us in Mozart's Don Juan? It is the transformation of the poem into a musical utterance, the transmission of the dramatic notion to the music, which, though not independent of the words, carries the hearer away over them, and it is this very fact which gives rise to the poetry of all operatic music whatsoever, to that poetry which, inherent in the notion of opera, and of itself fetterless, proceeds from and returns to the words. "Every operatic number," said Weber, who understood something about the matter, "should, by its structure, appear an independent entity; but as a portion of the edifice it ought to disappear in the contemplation of the whole; herein lies the great and profound secret of dramatic music, a secret that may be felt, but cannot be expressed.

Wagner's operas are recitatives in a certain number of acts, with music in the operatic style interspersed. The last applies especially to the mighty and moving choruses. Dargomijski's opera does not contain even a chorus, though, in the animated scene with Laura, and the crowd of admirers around her, there was an opportunity, as natural as dramatically effective, for introducing one. As it is seldom that in actual life or the spoken drama several persons talk at the same time, only one person is allowed to speak at once in The Stone Guest. But there are exceptions in real life, and why should there not be exceptions in art, which mirrors real life? How about choruses in tragedy? and in Schiller's Braut von Messina? We cannot conceive an opera—and The Stone Guest is called an opera—without a chorus and melodic invention. Why should opera deprive itself of its most powerful element, the chorus? To establish a peculiar kind of stage-play without a foundation? Does not such a work contain within itself the fatal drawback that, when the public are once acquainted with its subject, all further interest in it vanishes, while the interest continued and subjectively intensified in the soul of the hearer by operatic music holds its own? It is the same with realism in literature, and in the other arts, and this tendency, wherever it crops up, is not a saving and fructifying tendency, but, from its nature, a tendency which serves only the moment and its influences, and is specifically ephemeral. Music is above all things the art of the feelings (Gemüth). People want to change it from resounding poetry into a mental riddle, which is resounding simply because it is to be perceived by the ear, and which, without a lecture ad hoc, without a special programme, and an examen rigorusum to be undergone by and conducted by the hearer himself, cannot be understood. We find that between this material tendency and the masters representing dramatico-musical art, such as Mozart and Beethoven, Weber, Méhul, Cherubini, and Meyerbeer, as well as the good Italian composers, there is nothing in common, except that both the ones and the others employ musical notation. Melodic style always has been and always will be the very pith and marrow, the beginning and the end, of every possible kind of music. It is melodic invention alone which imparts to the language of tone the quality of a language of the soul, and the advantage, for the loss of which nothing could compensate, of asserting itself as a universal language, a pasigraphy, intelligible in all countries. Wagner's school produces the chrysalis, the grub, and says: "That is the butterfly!" In The Stone Guest there is, on principle, no question of melodic invention, or of a melodious style. Thus the work, to which a first place is unconditionally assigned by the Russian press, cannot be judged by the same standard as operatic music of the usual description. It is doubtful whether the composer, had he lived, would have assigned so much importance to the recitative in his work, which was conceived under the first influence of Wagnerian ideas, or whether he would have presented it in a form as naked as its present form to the stage, on which it will scarcely keep its ground, despite all the mastery he displays over his resources in a production opposed to our notions of opera. Dargomijski was known principally by two works written in the operatic style, namely, The Water Sprite, and Notre Dame de Paris; by the Cantata, The Feast of Bacchus, and a large number of Russian romances for the piano. To put him, as some persons do, on an equality with Glinka, is, in our opinion, mistaken patriotism. He comes first after Glinka, and his fancy is superior to Sérof's in the operas (?) Judith, and Rogneda; or the Hostile Power, which transport Wagner to Russia.

The performance of The Stone Guest is attended with peculiar difficulties. Each part is a recitative a tempo, and not a capella, in which the orchestra patiently obeys. In a recitative a tempo, strict attention must be paid to every word and the minutest part of a bar; such a recitative must be mechanically learnt by heart, because there is no stream of melody, no continuity of the musical phrase, to facilitate the task. Petrow, the worthy veteran of Russian opera, is a perfect Leporello; Melnickow, a satisfactory Don Juan; and Madame Platonow, a charming Donna Anna; but Madame Iljin is not strong enough for Donna Laura. Her style is pinched and unfinished. Puschkin's poem is a genial production: the Stone Guest, however, who is here the murdered husband of Donna Anna, strikes us as less tragic than the Commander as a father. As husband, he resembles more nearly Calderon's Physician of his own Honour, without making such a profound impression on the spectators.

THE VICISSITUDES OF A THEATRICAL MANAGER'S LIFE.

(From "The Sunday Times.")

Before I became pilot of the good old dramatic steamship, "Go-ahead," on account of my inexperience in such matters, I had the greatest difficulty to persuade the landlord to grant me a lease of the theatre. He, however, did so, and I advertised for a company. Everybody in the histrionic world applied I verily believe. There were among them novices who had never bearded the horror-stricken glare of the "footlights." The heaviest tragedians on earth advising me to start the legitimate drama, as that would pay the best, besides reflecting credit on my superior taste. Against that I had the opinion of some of the most atrocious stage villains of the old blood, thunder, and melodramatic school, counselling me to rely on sensation dramas or my fate would be sealed in a week. Here was a dilemma. I must own I rather preferred reading the legitimate drama than seeing it placed in the hands of incompetent exponents, and as all the parts in a classic play demand good actors (and I was not in a position to pay anything but a small though money-certain price for their services!), I abandoned the idea and announced sensation as my motto, and that to suit the fluctuating tastes of an incongruous audience, twenty murders and fourteen suicides in the most varied and approved mode of execution should characterise my opening piece, and if the public were not satisfied with that they should drop their cards in a box and select a drama for themselves with a thousand murders in it, "whether it ruined me or not!" My author was an unknown man; he assured me he had succeeded in weaving together such a string of novel and exciting incidents that it could not fail to "bring 'em down" and "take me up!" I read his maiden effort, and failed to detect a fault in it; this was, probably, my want of judgment. I was sitting down in the room allotted to me in my dignified position, holding receptions, when the advertising agent for Messrs. Paste, Puff, and Co., came in. He said they would circulate 30,000 bills at a shilling a thousand; they had stations which could not fail to catch the eye of a transitory throng. I thought it well to strike a bargain here. The next person who came into my room was a young man who wanted nothing but glory for his services, having acted as an amateur for many years with no moderate amount of success. I told him it was unsafe to entrust men who have no acquaintance with stage business. He, however, laid claim to high histrionic pretensions! I requested him to give me a proof of his elocution! He readily began, striking a wild attitude, "Now could I drink hot blood, and do such (stage) business as the bitter day would quake to look on!" He said he could play the Idiot of the Mountain splendidly. I assured him I was afraid it would turn out to be so if I engaged him, and he rather unwillingly absquatulated. Two elegantly-dressed ladies followed. They didn't want pay: they only wished an engagement; in fact they could, with their connections fill my private boxes every night, besides adding respectability to my theatre by their broughams stopping the way at my stage door! I jumped at them. The low comedian came next, and saluted me with "There be land-rates and water-rates, water thieves and land thieves—I mean pirates—and there is the peril of waters, winds and rocks!" I considered he might have addressed this observation to Mr. Lowe or Mr. Goschen. I thought him funny, and hinted that he must be the worse for liquor, whereupon he replied "Nay, I swear I am not so; I do but labour under the intoxicating influence of a bottle of ginger-beer!" I engaged the wag. It would be a suicidal policy to do without a ballet, so I was interviewed by a varied specimen of those light-footed creatures, with charming smiles and pretty faces, and as they were cheap I engaged them. The stage-manager next swaggered into my room. He spoke with a deep, sepulchral voice which never varied but ran on in a groove of monotony of the most deliberate and punctuated tones. When once you heard him you could not fail to recognise him always. He spoke of the multitude of dramas he had produced. I asked his advice on the subject. He said, "Let 'em have two heavy pieces every Saturday, but for the rest of the week sensation!" I courted his opinion of Macbeth. He said "There was no vampire trap for the ghost to appear." I replied "Couldn't you shove him on from the side wings?" He remarked "No! how the d—l could a ghost come on from the side, while ever since he remembered they had come up and gone down the vampire trap?" I replied, "Never mind then;" and I don't believe he did! The leading lady bounced into the room; she was perfection. She had a large volume of press notices and reviews of so flattering a description that she herself, being equal to a host, would draw a house full, requesting me to read them for my own conviction, which I respectfully declined. Being captivated I at once gave her her own terms. The super-master came next and said he had a respectable body of young gentlemen (who were known from their habitually taking roost in the casual wards of Lambeth and other workhouses during the off season!) and said at the small charge of 1s. per evening they found their own clean boots and linen, besides reflecting the highest credit on my management. They had acquired and begot a well-trained stage stride, which was the result only of years' drilling. He said as soldiers on the field o' Bosworth they had acquitted themselves in true military fashion, and that they very rarely plugged one another's eyes out with the spears and banners entrusted to their care. I was satisfied. The next person wanted to rent the bars; he said he could fit 'em up and make 'em look like an Eastern palace, and guaranteed that the liquor should be genuine and good. He said he was well known, and the fact of his having the bars would alone suffice to fill the theatre every night. I considered him a very eligible tenant indeed. A ballet mistress skipped into the room like a light and airy nothing of forty stone! She was directly accommodated with a seat. She had so fluttered and buzzed about I thought she was trying to fascinate me with her wily coquetry. She entered fully into the details connected with the graceful gyrations of her troupe, their fully-developed limbs, beautiful forms, &c., and strove to convince me that her ideas were not to be excelled by any other professor of the saltatory art. "All right," I said; she evidently felt so. The next person was the wardrobe master. He tip-toed into the room with one of the most polite assumptions of self-importance. He assured me he could dodge me up a lot of capital stuff out of the old material on the establishment, and that he knew how to convert a gendarme's suit into a waiter's of the most elegant and modern style; that he understood transformations better than any man alive; that he had been engaged for years on the premises, had made costumes for King George the First, even to a chimney sweep. That acting upon the principle of studying his employer's interest, he had succeeded all his life in giving the liveliest satisfaction. Upright fellow, I thought! The scene painter entered, and persuaded me he could vamp up a lot of picturesque scenery, which would effectuate a great saving. I thanked him. The gas man came next, and told me the gas company wanted looking after, because they sent more wind than gas through the pipes. He prided himself on understanding light and shade, and would take care the drama was lighted up, &c., when necessary. The master carpenter walked in, and on my asking him the question, said his men only struck when they didn't get paid down on the nail. I informed him they should be paid on the fall of the hammer! The leader of the band came next, and boasted that his men could not be matched even by the Opera band, and that they were only in the habit of taking out the big drum and stopping short in rather awkward scenes when they didn't get their salaries, which, of course, could not happen with me, I assured him!

The opening night came. The critics assembled in solemn conclave, passed a milk-and-watery compliment on the actors, extolled the author, whom they believed was capable of writing a higher order of drama, while the manager was told that there must have been an entire absence of discretion or how could he have produced such trash! "Thank you, Mr. Dram Crit," I said, "I will live on the fat of my fading hopes. I will yet survive the reports of ignorant boys and incompetent critics who have never been behind the scenes nor understand the smallest stage directions." The weather was 110 degrees of heat! What was that to me? I had always believed a theatre could be crowded as much in summer as winter, and as I was buoyed up with the most felicitous expectations, and went on working away in the great Thespian home with what success let the sequel tell. I found the bill-poster was in the habit of putting my double-crowns into a bag with a weight attached, and quietly lowering them into the Thames at night, which I believe is a very good circulating medium! The young ladies who acted for nothing so mauled the parts they had to play that the audience hissed them, and, although they filled my boxes, they, by their inartistic efforts, emptied my pit and gallery! The man who rented my bars filled my house with orders! I was too modest to refuse them admittance. The wardrobe on the first night was not ready. Everybody seemed misfitted. Nobody had the costumes they wanted, so they all went on in their own clothes, and as a consequence were immediately recognized by the audience. Many of them chirruped and made sport of the dramatis personæ most cruelly, especially the supers about the casual wards. Zounds! I was in a fearful rage. I never shall forget the humiliation. The scene-painter was not ready either, and in the confusion the scene-shifters shunted on a mediæval interior to a portion of a distant view of the sea! I remember the leading lady bathing my temples and plunging her scent-bottle under my nose to keep me from expiring on the spot. Then the blessed gas was down when it should have been up, and they had forgotten to buy the green glasses for the water scenes. It was shocking. The house never paid, and several times when the carpenters did not get their money on the Saturday they playfully refused to push a scene on or remove them off. The band refused to go into the orchestra, and after an interval of half-an-hour they resumed their seats, not until my leading lady had died without a chord from those gentlemen. There was a clique of leaden plummets about, and directly they saw the ship was sinking, added their weight towards its accomplishment. They were the wreckers! They threatened to pull the establishment down about my ears if I did'nt get out of it; and deeming it more prudent to follow the dictates of wisdom than stick like a faithful pilot at the helm of a sinking concern, I abandoned the ship to its fate, and very shortly afterwards it struck upon a rock, sank into the boundless deep, and was buried and forgotten in the troubled waters of managerial misfortunes, regretting I had ever dabbled in one of the most uncertain, precarious, yet exciting, lives that any man can possibly lead for a short period of his existence.

PERTH.—The Abbate Franz Liszt has fixed his quarters here for the present. Contrary to his usual custom, he will give one public Liszt Evening this month, and another in March. His object in taking this step is to assist a well-known German composer, who is suffering from an incurable disease, and for whom Herr Joachim, also, lately gave a concert.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

On Monday evening Mdme. Schumann made her first appearance for the season, and was received with the accustomed favour. The accomplished pianist, on whose performances the interest of the evening was naturally concentrated, selected for her solo display, as on previous occasions, the second Sonata of Beethoven's set of three, Op. 31—viz., that in D minor, which has been proclaimed by eminent German critics, the "dramatic sonata, par excellence," and if the keys of the pianoforte can represent "dramatic" impressions, there is no example to be cited by which such impressions are more powerfully suggested. A distinguished quality of Mdme. Schumann's playing, apart from her universally acknowledged skill as a mistress of the instrument in all its mechanical requirements, is her power of realizing the ideas of a composer, whatever conditions may have influenced him during the process of composition. Hence she is essentially a genuine interpreter of Beethoven, who, of all writers for the pianoforte, was the most imaginative and the least mechanical. We need not describe over and over again Mdme. Schumann's reading of the D minor Sonata, one of the most peculiarly individual emanations from the genius of Beethoven. In the impassioned Allegro with which it begins, the melodious and pathetic Adagio and the Allegretto, its concluding movement, she was equally at home. At the end of the performance she was unanimously applauded, and twice called back to the platform; but instead of repeating Beethoven's finale, she played a romanza—one of a set of four characteristic pieces by Robert Schumann. How Mdme. Schumann plays her late husband's music need hardly be stated, and never did she give her whole soul to it with more enthusiasm than in her execution on Monday night of the pianoforte part in the well known D minor trio. Her associates were Mdme. Norman-Néruda and Signor Piatti, who, to judge by their playing, heartily sympathized with the gifted pianist. In short, Mdme. Schumann impressed her audience as of old.

The quartets were Mozart's in B flat, one of the set of six dedicated to Haydn, and Haydn's in E flat, perhaps the finest of the ten he composed in that key. Both were played to perfection by Mdme. Néruda, Herr L. Ries, M. Zerbini, and Signor Piatti. Every amateur of genuine and sterling music for the chamber must be gratified to find that the director, Mr. Arthur Chappell, is paying more and more attention to the quartets of that most consummate of all quartet writers, Haydn. During the present series of concerts he has brought forward several specimens of the master hitherto unknown to the greater number of those who habitually frequent St. James's Hall, and not one has been heard without unqualified pleasure.

The singer was Mdlle. Nita Gaetano, who gave extremely well an air by Pergolesi, and created a sensible impression in a new and charming song, by Mr. George Osborne—"The Robin and the Maiden"—obtaining a well-merited recall. Sir Julius Benedict was the accompanist. At the next concert Herr Joseph Joachim is to make his first appearance for the season.

MUNICH.—The Augsberger Abendzeitung informs us that it was exactly fifty years ago, on the 15th January, that the Theatre Royal or Hof-Theater (literally, Court Theatre), was burnt down, after being built only five years. The fire raged nearly twenty-four hours, but fortunately no lives were lost. The present theatre was erected within less than two years, at a cost of 1,920,000 florins. Of this sum, the Insurance Offices contributed 120,000 florins; the molten metal and other materials fetched about 600,000 florins, and the Corporation voted 300,000 florins, leaving a deficit of 850,000 florins. This sum, also, was advanced by the Corporation, so that the "Court Theatre" was at first erected solely at the cost of the city, and not the Court. To pay off the loan, a second "beer-penny" (a tax of a German penny upon every measure of beer consumed here—a German penny being equal to about an English farthing), was voted, to be levied till the debt was extinguished. But, though the Corporation have long since had their money returned, the "beer-penny" remains a fact, and the beer-drinkers are still unconsciously paying for the Theatre Royal. It is a remarkable fact that in all countries, and not in England alone, a tax seems to resemble the garment given by Dejanira to Hercules; once put on, there it sticks.—The King has forwarded a large sum out of his private purse to re-establish the pension-fund for the artists and others employed at the Theatre Royal. No new pension has been granted for twenty-five years.

HANOVER.—The General Committee of the Marschner Memorial have decided on accepting the design sent in by Herr Hartzing, which represents the composer in a standing position between two figures seated. A sub-committee has been appointed to make the requisite arrangements with Herr Hartzing.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

Though the recent vagaries of our eccentric climate could not affect the audience which crowded into St. James's Hall on Wednesday week, they were able to influence the artists, and much disturb the programme. Mr. Sims Reeves was kept away altogether, and Madame Patey could only get through half her allotted task; while, to make matters worse, a domestic affliction prevented Mr. Nordblom from appearing. But Mr. Boosey was able to make fair amends for this triple disappointment by engaging Mr. E. Lloyd, and by availing himself of the kindness of Mr. Santley, who cheerfully agreed to sing an extra song, so that the entertainment passed off well, and everybody was content. Several of the novelties set down for performance had necessarily to be omitted, but others were given by Madame Patey and Mr. Santley, the lady contributing J. L. Roeckel's "Heaven's light," and the gentleman being heard in Prince Poniatowski's "Stag Hunt." As regards the first of these, it will be better to suspend judgment. Madame Patey sang under difficulties, the full force of which became evident when an apology was made for her subsequent non-appearance. As this favourite artist is not one who lightly abandons her task, the disadvantage attendant upon her rendering of Roeckel's new effusion may be imagined. Mr. Santley, on the other hand, was in fine "form," and gave "The Stag Hunt" with a mixture of vigour and pathos which roused his audience to enthusiasm. The song is capitally written, and contains a very effective contrast, presented by the energy of the conventional hunting passages, and the feeling of those episodes wherein the poor stag plays the chief part. That Prince Poniatowski has supplied one of the best songs of its kind, and a formidable rival to "The Yeoman's Wedding," cannot be doubted. Mr. Santley was called upon to repeat it; but the artist, who had already worked hard, substituted the less exacting ballad by Henriette, "My King and I." Among the more familiar successes of the concert were the encores gained by Madame Patey for Henriette's "Always alone," by Mr. Lloyd for Sullivan's "Once again," and Miss Banks for Claribel's "Five o'clock in the morning." Miss Wynne's contribution of two Welsh songs—"The Ash Grove," and "A silent maid"—was warmly appreciated, as were the pianoforte solos of Mr. Brinley Richards, who selected two of his own Fantasias on Welsh airs.

BRITISH ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

The programme of this society's fifth concert was as follows:—

Symphony, No. 3, A minor, Scottish—Mendelssohn; Song, "The Wanderer" (Mr. Lewis Thomas)—Schubert; Song, MS., "Over the roof and over the wall," Sapphire Necklace (Miss Edith Wynne)—Sullivan; Overture (first time) to Shakspeare's Winter's Tale (composed expressly for this society)—John Frances Barnett; Song, "Rose, softly blooming," Azor and Zemira (Miss Julia Elton)—Spohr; Song, "The shades of evening close around" (Mr. E. Lloyd)—F. Clay; Grand polonaise in E flat, pianoforte (Miss Nathalie Evans)—Chopin; Quartet, "God is a Spirit," Woman of Samaria (Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Lewis Thomas)—W. S. Bennett; Overture, Egmont—Beethoven,

A work so well known as the Scotch Symphony could not fail to be well played, and on this occasion the violins particularly distinguished themselves throughout the slow movement, the first theme of which we have never heard more beautifully "sung." The Finale was scarcely so good, owing to shortcomings in the "wind department." Those shortcomings we hope to see remedied by another season. Mr. Barnett's overture is noticed elsewhere; and we go on to the Polonaise of Chopin merely to state that whoever persuaded Miss Evans into a premature appearance did her a very bad service. The young lady has ability, and in time will make a good player; but, at present, she is merely in a state of pupilage, and should confine herself to private study and practice. More than this need not be said, save to warn the new society against seeking its artists from the nursery. Beethoven's overture has been much better given; the "wind" again exhibiting its shortcomings with a persistency worthy of a better cause. The vocal music pleased greatly. Mr. Lewis Thomas sang the "Wanderer" as we have not often heard it sung, all the pathos and passion of the music being admirably brought out. Miss Wynne had to repeat Sullivan's picturesque air; Miss Elton gave a capital reading of "Rose softly blooming;" and Mr. Clay's charming song was done justice to by Mr. Lloyd, though its tempo might have been quickened with advantage. The quartet from The Woman of Samaria—beautifully sung—met with its usual fate, an encore. Mr. Mount conducted all the works save Mr. Barnett's overture.

DRESDEN.—The last novelty at the Royal Operahouse was Herr Max Bruch's grand opera, Hermione. Though mounted with the greatest care and liberality, and exceedingly well performed by all concerned, it pleased so little as to be given only twice, and was then withdrawn. It will probably never be revived.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

In addition to the Symphony noticed elsewhere, five other works by Schubert helped to commemorate, on Saturday week, the morrow of the composer's birthday. Among them were two novelties: a part-song. "Night in the forest," and a "Hymn to the Holy Ghost." The first is supposed to bear date 1827, and consists of two movements for men's voices, with accompaniment of four horns obbligato. Its ensemble is charming, thanks, in great part, to the skilful treatment of the horns, which lend truthful colour to the music, and allow of some striking effects. The Hymn was written in 1828 (Schubert's death year), and is also for men's voices, quartet and chorus, with accompaniment of oboes, clarionets, bassoons, trumpets, horns, and trombones. Apart from the novelty of these adjuncts, the work is not very striking, being for the most part commonplace and lugubrious withal. We cannot but think that a better choice might easily have been made, though, perhaps, it was well to make the acquaintance of a work so pretentious in its character. Both pieces were sung by a small choir, headed by Messrs. Guy, Howell, Parker, and Pope. The three known compositions introduced on the occasion were the overture to Rosamunde, the beautiful romance from the same work (sung by Mdme. Sherrington), and the part-song, "Gondolier." Weber's overture to Euryanthe, and Henselt's Pianoforte Concerto, made up the balance of the programme. The former calls for no remark, but the latter was heard for the first time at the Crystal Palace. Without being a great composition, measured by the standard of the great masters, it is one of much interest, and deserves the consideration due to a work which emanates from a man who stands at the head of his profession. As a means of display, the concerto can hardly be surpassed. Indeed, we question if anything more difficult was ever written, and it is all the more to the credit of Mr. Oscar Beranger that he rendered it throughout with faultless accuracy. A more emphatic performance Herr Henselt himself could hardly have wished.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to an article in your valuable paper of February 1st, reflecting on the amateur orchestral society of this city, and proceeding from your own correspondent.

* * * * * * * * *

But I cannot remain longer silent, when that self-constituted critic pours his hostile lucubrations into the columns of an English musical periodical, so generally esteemed, and widely circulated at home and abroad, with a view to mislead the English and foreign public; and in its pages, uses his utmost efforts to hold up to ridicule a deserving musical society, and to connect a foreign name, highly respected in the musical world, with what he chooses to represent as an extraordinary musical exhibition.

Under these circumstances, you will pardon, I hope, the liberty I take of occupying so much of your valuable space with my humble protest and repudiation of such pretensions as those of your Glasgow correspondent. It is with reluctance that I undertake this task, but I owe it to your readers to put them on their guard against one capable of playing such fantastic tricks. Trusting in the high standard of your paper, they might suppose those reports are written by a competent judge; but it will not be useless to remind them that the grandsons of "Midas" are still at large.—Yours, &c., A. DAUSSEIGNE MÉHUL.

Glasgow, 8th February, 1873.

[We willingly insert M. Méhul's letter, omitting two paragraphs which contain assumptions and personalities wholly beside the mark. It is our duty to say, without judging the particular question at issue, that we have confidence both in the ability and integrity of our Glasgow correspondent.—Ed.]

LUBECK.—Musikdirector Gottfried Hermann's 4th Soirée Musicale took place on the 1st of February, with the following programme: String Quartet by J. Haydn; Nocturne for harp, violin, and violoncello, by Oberthür; "Ave Maria," for soli and chorus, by Oberthür; String Quartet by Beethoven; "Exaudi Deus," for soli and chorus, with harp and harmonium accompaniments, by Oberthür; solo, harp, "Clouds and Sunshine," by Oberthür; Impromptu militaire, by Zamara. The concert was well attended, and gave great satisfaction. The choral works were performed by the members of the Vocal Society, who evidently took great interest in the compositions, which pleased very much; it was expected that the composer would have been present, and have played in this Soirée, but he was obliged to return to England; therefore Fraulein Anna Dubez, from Schwerin, was engaged to play the harp part in "Exaudi Deus," which she did admirably. She was also highly successful in the two harp solos above mentioned.

M. GOUNOD'S CHOIR.

A series of five "Subscription Concerts," our musical readers are doubtless aware, has for some time been announced, with M. Gounod as director. That the eminent French musician has been diligently training a choir, composed chiefly of amateurs, is a fact not less generally known; and, if we may draw conclusions from the programme of the first concert, given on Saturday night, in St. James's Hall, one of M. Gounod's principal reasons for undertaking these performances is to bring forward compositions of his own. Anything, new or old, to which the name of the composer of Faust, Mireille, Romeo et Juliette is affixed, must naturally be welcome to those who care for music good and earnest of its kind. We should have been glad to see the hall on Saturday more crowded; but every enterprise of this sort must have a beginning, and public sympathy can only be excited by hearsay reports of its progress, and by the gradual steps taken to secure for it a permanent attraction. For our own part we should rate "M. Gounod's Concerts" still higher if the programmes were not limited to M. Gounod's compositions. Out of fourteen pieces, on Saturday night, only three were not absolutely from his pen; and even one of these was half his property, being the "Ave Maria" which he has wedded to John Sebastian Bach's first Prelude (from the Well-tempered Clavier)—the only apology for such a liberty being the genuine beauty of the melody—played, on the occasion under notice, upon the violin, by a young gentleman, described in the programme as "honorary member of the Choir." The first part of the selection, besides this "Ave Maria," published and known through so many different arrangements, was devoted exclusively to ecclesiastical pieces, and comprised a new setting of the "Pater Noster" a Requiem, and a psalm ("Omnipotent Lord") by M. Gounod, as well as the contralto air, "He was despised," from the Messiah, sung by another young gentleman, "member of the choir" (and encored). The "Pater Noster," and the Requiem are successful examples of M. Gounod's power to write for sacred themes music which, while simple, shall also be telling and expressive. There is in neither of them any attempt at unusual harmony or elaborate contrapuntal device; and the aim of the composer, to suit them for general use where large resources are not at hand, is evident. In our opinion, he has admirably carried out his intention. The "Pater Noster," in its way, is irreproachable. The "Introit," "Kyrie Eleison," and "Agnus Dei" of the Requiem were not new to the English admirers of M. Gounod's sacred music, having been publicly performed some time since. Whatever expectations these may have raised are fully carried out by the "Offertorium," "Sanctus," and "Pie Jesu," which now complete the work. The "Sanctus" especially touches us by its solemnity. Rarely have words of serious import been more emphatically expressed with so little apparent straining after effect. This was undoubtedly the best executed piece of the evening, and the unanimous encore it obtained was a just recognition of its merit. Not to enter further into details—unnecessary, by the way, in reference to a work of so unpretentious a character—we may safely predict for this new Requiem a wide-spread popularity in places for which it is expressly intended. The performance was conducted by M. Gounod himself, who was received by the audience with every mark of cordiality.

The second part of the concert consisted of secular compositions, exclusively from the pen of M. Gounod, three of which—a part song, "Gitanella," a double chorus, "Bright star of eve," and two Italian canzonets, "Perchè pisagi?" and "Ho messo nuove corde"—for a tenor voice—were heard for the first time. There was also his setting of Lord Byron's "Maid of Athens," sung with true feeling by a lady "member of the choir," who was recalled and much applauded. The chief interest of the concert, however, attached to the first part and the sacred music.

VIENNA.—There has been some talk of Mdlle. Ehnn's leaving the Imperial Operahouse here for the Royal Operahouse in Berlin. The young lady appeared lately in a round of operas at the last-named establishment, and pleased the Berliners so much that she was asked to become a permanent member of the company. In Vienna she receives 16,000 florins annually (2,000 being deducted for taxes, &c), and two months' leave. Herr von Hülsen, the Royal Prussian Intendant, offered her 11,000 thalers annually, five months' leave of absence out of every twelve, the title of Kammersängerin, and a pension of 2000 thalers in case of retirement. Before giving Herr von Hulsen an answer to his tempting offer, Mdlle. Ehnn laid the matter before Herr Herbeck, the manager of the Imperial Operahouse, by whom it was referred to the Intendant-General, Count Wrbna. It is thought that the Count will give the young lady the same terms as Herr von Hülsen offers, and thus keep her here.

THE OPERA AT MALTA.

MR. BENTHAM AND MDME. BENTHAM-FERNANDEZ.

(From the "Malta News" of January 22.)

M. Gounod's Faust, here, as elsewhere, probably the most popular work of the operatic répertoire, was produced on Saturday last for Signor Padovani's benefit; and, from the state of the house, we imagine that the result must have been satisfactory to that deserving artist.

Signor Bentham sustained the part of Faust in a manner which even his warmest admirers can hardly have been prepared for. His melodious voice appeared to possess a power and depth which we have not heard in it before, his acting an unwonted force, and the correctness with which he gave every note made his performance one which could not be listened to without pleasure, and which we consider entitled to high commendation. The part of Mephistopheles demands gifts and qualifications which are found combined in few artists, still Signor Padovani performed it satisfactorily; and the singing of some portions, especially the "Dio dell'or," and the serenade, "Tu che fai l'addor mentata" fully deserved the applause which it received. In Valentino we made acquaintance with a new comer, Signor Lenghi, whose voice, though not very powerful, is pleasing, and his execution good. Of Signora Bentham, as Margherita, we can only say that she is Margherita! From her first entrance upon the stage, when, with downcast eye and modest mien, she replies to the solicitation of Faust, to the last scene in the prison, when her sorrows at length find an end in death, we seem to see before us, not the prima donna, not the actress, but the German maiden herself, Goethe's own Gretchen. Her singing combines power, taste, and execution which we have seldom heard surpassed. The charming simplicity with which she sings the ballad, "C'era un Re di Thule," the brilliancy of her execution in the Jewel Song, her tenderness in the duet with Faust, and her passionate despair in the latter scenes are alike admirable; in one and all the purity and richness of her voice, and the grace of her acting carried the house by storm, while the hearty applause and frequent encores she received testified to her complete and unqualified success.

Signora Magi sings very prettily the part of Siebel, and the melodious "Parlatele d'amor" received full justice from her fine voice.

The chorus was, perhaps, little more inefficient than usual, thus considerably marring the tout ensemble of the opera. They sang, or rather croaked, utterly regardless of time or tune. As for the mounting of the opera, the less said the better, some of the chorus, and notably those of the brass band, appear as if they could not hold their dilapidated rags together much longer. When they quite fall to pieces, perhaps we shall be treated to some a little less shabby. As for the vision which concludes the opera, it is so remarkable a feat of scenic art as to defy description.

Moscow.—In consequence of her having proved anything but a great success in St. Petersburgh, the management of the Italian Opera have sent Mdme. Mallinger here, but the lady has not benefited much by the change. On the night of her first appearance, the house, it is true, was crammed to suffocation—because Dinorah had been announced with Mdme. Adelina Patti, but Mdme. Patti was prevented by indisposition from singing, and L'Elisir was put up, Mdme. Mallinger sustaining the part of Adina. The result was something very like a fiasco.

In Memoriam.

HEYWARD J. ST. LEGER, ESQ.

DIED, FEB. 6TH, 1873.

Let music weep! for one who loved her well
Has pass'd from earth away; no magic spell,
Nor charm that dwells within this lower sphere,
Can wake the tender friend to us so dear.

"Friend of the artist," kind to all around,
A welcome guest where sweetest tones abound,
Place Shamrock on his heart, while "Erin's Isle,"
In sorrow for her son, forgets to smile.

Now sweetest poetry our grief shall share,
For him who woo'd the sister arts so fair,
One who in both with tender grace excell'd,
And oft chill care with cheerful songs dispell'd.

Tho' he on earth no more may charm the ear,
And o'er his grave we drop the fruitless tear,
May he, ascending to the realms above,
Join in the melody that angels love.

MUSIC BUILDINGS.

On Monday evening last a paper was read, at the meeting of the Institute of Architects, which illustrated in quite an unanticipated way the existence of the most striking scientific shortcomings in architectural practice where one would scarcely expect they would be found. The wild complaints which at the present moment are being so constantly advanced against architects in the everyday press, as to be virtually unanswerable from the sheer pressure of their multiplicity, are generally found to turn upon matters of little magnitude in a scientific sense; indeed, the complainants would do much better, as a rule, if they would direct their attacks against our bricklayers, plumbers, and joiners (who too frequently cease to be builders when they become general contractors), and leave architects altogether out of the controversy. But it is quite another thing when an experienced professional critic and a thoughtful enquirer and writer, such as Mr. Statham, of Liverpool, is known to be, comes straightforwardly before his brethren, formally assembled, and taking up such a subject as the designing of what we may coin a phrase to call Music Buildings, proves by sober argument and illustration the sweeping assertion that the great halls and theatres of music, of which we are accustomed sometimes to boast not a little, are in fact too often contrived much more in defiance of the first principles of musical-acoustical science (which, by the way, is not merely acoustical,) than in pursuance of anything approaching to that exhaustive investigation of natural laws which we are so fond of identifying with the spirit of invention in the nineteenth century. One expression which Mr. Statham used in his dissertation seems more than all else to fasten the stigma, if not upon architects, certainly upon the modus operandi of their work; for musical effect, he says, and architectural effect appear to be incompatible. That is to say, the ordinary forms which the architectural designer makes use of, as expressing artistically, however unaffectedly, the conditions of construction, are in practice enough of themselves to destroy the effect of music. This is a remarkable proposition, but a moment's reflection renders it perfectly intelligible. The architect has only to look at such a thing as a violin or a trombone, and is it not as clear as noonday that those instruments are, if not very much akin to music chambers, certainly sufficiently allied to them to illustrate the fact that common house-building and music-chamber-building are based upon different fundamentals.

Perhaps the most pompous music-chamber in England is St. George's Hall at Liverpool. It was built for the express, not to say the sole, purpose of a concert-hall. Mr. Statham tells us nevertheless that the brilliant young architect who by this one design acquired such high popularity—to be enjoyed for so short a time, for Mr. Elmes died almost before he had arrived at manhood—made no secret of the fact that the specific adaptation of his grand interior for the actual performance of music was a thing that he held to be beneath his consideration. The absurdity of such a confession surely seems plain enough; but this absurdity becomes even more astonishing when we reflect that the real doctrine held by such a designer only about forty years ago amounted to this—that the idea of his condescending to compromise in a music-chamber the conventional forms of architecture for the sake of the enjoyment of music was too absurd to be entertained. Let not the architects of the passing day, however, profess to be much more amenable to common sense; for Mr. Statham further allows us to understand that he has precisely the same grievance against the designers of the multitudinous Gothic churches of the hour. These artists, he says, somewhat sarcastically, may no doubt be governed by adequate considerations of ritual, but they are certainly not influenced by an appreciation of music: for they construct their "Organ chambers" precisely in the way, and place them precisely in the position, which must be allowed to be the least conducive to the charms of musical effect.

The much-vaunted Albert Hall is a model which it seems is equally, with the great Liverpool building, at variance with scientific principles. We all know how much controversy there was at the time of the inauguration of this nobly immense music-chamber respecting the more interesting than agreeable "echo" of the place; how it engaged the attention of the most distinguished philosophers, and was by some pronounced an obvious matter of course, whilst others deemed it an incomprehensible eccentricity of nature; how the "velarium" was politely accepted by a loyal public as the perfect remedy of science, with even a grace of its own beyond the reach of art; and how it was, nevertheless, whispered by the few, as it is now outspoken by the many, that the remedy is, after all, but very imperfect, if not also a little ugly. Mr. Statham puts his finger on the root of the matter by pointing out that, just as St. George's Hall was made a grandiose assembly-room, leaving music to take its chance, so the Albert Hall is nothing but a grandiose amphitheatre, leaving music to discover, when too late, that its conditions have been not culpably neglected at all, but ignorantly misunderstood—which is even worse. Even to the last, in such a thing as the two conflicting theories of wall covering, for example—one of which is in favour of sharp sound-reflecting surfaces, such as marble and cement, whilst the other prefers absorbent surfaces, such as upholstery, it appears that science was at sea; for Mr. Statham mentions the remarkable incident that, in spite of the utter failure of the first of these in St. George's Hall, the organ-builder had no hesitation in recommending for the Albert Hall the same principle—the rejection of which, he asserts, has alone prevented a vast augmentation of that confusedness of sound which is so much complained of. We may here mention that there is a third theory, in favour of the use of resonant material, such as wood and that it is to the acceptance of this so far sound doctrine, in the case of the Albert Hall that we owe, in spite of one of the most extremely disadvantageous of all forms of interior, what musical capabilities the edifice is found to possess. The evil effects, however, that may be found to result from even this third mode of design are said to be painfully illustrated in the echo of the great-reading-room at the British Museum, where the dome is lined with "fibrous slab" (a material made of rags and other fibre with paste), one of the foremost of the alleged characteristics of which is that it is equally resonant with wood. One more circumstance relative to the Albert Hall possesses almost a melancholy interest. So long as the interior was filled with scaffolding the musical-acoustical effect was perfect, but alas! every pole and putlog that were removed only detracted from this exquisite success!

The third grand example cited amongst the music-chambers of England is the Crystal Palace; but we feel at a loss to see how this altogether exceptional case can be fairly argued upon. If the great halls at Liverpool and South Kensington were built expressly for concert uses, the same cannot surely be said of the stupendous greenhouse at Sydenham; and when a thousand musicians are made to perform before twenty thousand hearers under a vast vault of glass, and amidst a whole labyrinth of echoing aisles and vibrating galleries of iron, whose interminable lines stretch away to the limits of almost total silence, conditions so unsuitable become scarcely credible. If, as we are told, the effect of all this, as regards indistinctness, is comparatively little, we understand that it is only less than might seem to be likely in such a desperate case; and when it is admitted that all sitters towards the sides must expect to hear confusedly, this is obviously a surrender at discretion of the claims of the Crystal Palace model in respect of musical acoustics.

Without going further into those particulars of the question which are given in the report of the lecture itself, it may fairly be said that the lamentable deficiencies which appear to be manifested in an almost equal degree in each one of the grand concert halls which have been quoted, the wide disparity of principle accepted in them, and the equally unintelligent way in which, in all cases, the form for the chamber has been sought out from amongst precedents which belonged to altogether different categories of building science, are overpowering in the effect they must produce upon any scientific mind with reference to the shortcomings of practical design. If our ordinary theatres are better devised, it seems to be due to nothing more than the adoption of an accepted model, without much desire to improve upon it; and if our ordinary concert rooms, again, are more or less successful, it is because they are too small to require much science in their contrivance. The illustration, moreover, is an excellent one as regards the whole question of scientific plan. Artistic effect is worthy of all commendation; so is sound and clever construction; but aptitude of contrivance is none the less—perhaps all the more—a thing to be assiduously cultivated. —The Architect.

BRESLAU.—The first of the second series of Orchestral Union Concerts went off extremely well. Professor August Wilhelmj was much applauded for his performance of Raff's Violin Concerto in B flat minor, dedicated to him by the composer. He played, also, "Albumblatt," Wagner; "Notturno," Chopin; and "Abendlied," Schumann. The programme included, likewise, several scenes from Lassen's setting of Hebbel's Nibelungen, which had never been heard here before, and which pleased very much; Mendelssohn's overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream, and Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony."—Herr Ignatius Peter Lüstner, the Nestor of Silesian violinists, died here, a short time since, of apoplexy. He was struck down while giving a lesson. He was born in 1792. Among his numerous pupils are, in addition to his two sons, Otto and Louis, Professor Julius Stern, and Herr Robert Radecke.

NEW YORK.—Mr. Richard Hoffman has given his first soirée this year. The clever artist played, with Mr. J. Burke and Mr. F. Bergner, Schubert's trio, Op. 99; with Mr. Bergner, Mendelssohn's Sonata, Op. 58; and "Four Songs" for violin and pianoforte (Schumann) with the same artist. Mr. Hoffman's solo performances were Handel's Second Concerto, Chopin's "Andante Spianato and Polonaise," and two of his own compositions, "Les Clochettes" and "Caprice de Concert." After his performance of Handel's Concerto, Mr. Hoffman was recalled, when he gave the variations on the "Harmonious Blacksmith."

TWO NOVELTIES.

John Francis Barnett is, in one respect at least, more fortunate than Franz Peter Schubert. Barnett can hear his works performed; Schubert could hear his only with the inner sense. Barnett commands the applause of listening audiences; but Schubert had to content himself with such a prophetic view of post-mortem triumph as confidence in his own genius vouchsafed. Without grudging our countryman his good luck, we may permit ourselves to look upon this as a splendid example of the irony of fate. What had poor Schubert done that he, with his brilliant gifts, his fine artistic instincts, and his noble ambition—what had he done that the great Controlling Hand should have kept him crushed down to the earth? We do not know, but the temptation is, in view of such a phenomenon, to—

" * * * reason fiercely,
And call the laws of Providence unequal."

But, after all, we may be disquieting ourselves needlessly. The marvellous system of compensation that runs through the material world is not limited in its scope, but prevails equally in the world of mind. We will believe, therefore, that Schubert was not less happy in his life than his apparently more fortunate successors are in theirs. It was given him, on the principle that, "as thy day is, so thy strength shall be:"

"To wait the leisure of the righteous gods,
Till they, in their own good appointed hour,
Should bid his better days come forth at once,
A long and shining train; till he, well pleased,
Should bow, and bless his fate, and say the gods are just."

If it were known how small a part of our life is that which Shakspeare described as "rounded with a sleep," much seemingly anomalous now would lose its mystery, and "justify the ways of God to man." But even as our knowledge now is, we see that, while justice may be delayed, its ultimate and triumphant assertion is sure. Does not Schubert himself supply a proof of this most comfortable fact? Who could have anticipated, a few years ago, when the composer of the Wanderer and the Erl King was chiefly known as a writer of songs, that in 1873, and earlier, his fame would be spread over the earth, and that musicians everywhere would eagerly contend for the possession of his dusty and neglected manuscripts. Such is the fact, however, and, seeing it, let all who value the success of whatever deserves to succeed, take heart of grace. The world is not yet given over to the reign of Chance, unless Chance be, as Coleridge said, "but the pseudonyme of God for those particular cases which He does not choose to subscribe openly with His own sign-manual."

Another stage in Schubert's onward progress was reached last Saturday week, when his fifth symphony (B flat) was played for the first time at the Crystal Palace. This work was known to be in existence before Mr. Grove rummaged Dr. Schneider's cupboard, and, indeed, the Crystal Palace manager saw the "parts" in Mr. Herbeck's possession. But the autograph score, it appears, could not be found. The cupboard contained it not, nor did Mr. Grove's repeated inquiry lead to any good results. His anxiety to secure the work, however, may have suggested its possible value to others, and thus led to the eventual finding of the treasure. At all events, Mr. Grove informs us that, "last spring, the symphony suddenly appeared in the well-known Peter's Edition, arranged for four hands. This was sufficient to show that the score had been found, and that the original, or a copy, was in the possession of that most enterprising firm. After some correspondence, I obtained the loan of it, through the kind offices of Mr. Augener, and great was my delight when I undid the parcel and found the autograph itself. Somewhat careless, perhaps, to send such a treasure flying about the world hither and thither; but I, at least, have no reason to complain." So much for the circumstances attending the production of the work. All that is known of its history can be told in yet briefer time; for Schubert, who was little more than "nobody" in his day, had nobody to take the trouble of recording his achievements. As is well known, he wrote in all nine symphonies, including the fragment in B minor; that under notice is the fifth, and bears date 1816, the twentieth year of its composer's life, and by no means one of his busiest, if Dr. Kreissle may be trusted. The symphony is scored without clarionets, trumpets, trombones, or drums; a fact which will undoubtedly be to its disadvantage, as in the parallel cases presented by many other compositions now never heard because unsuitable to our big orchestras, and the prevalent love of noise. Why Schubert wrote for so small a band in this particular case will, probably, never be found out, nor does it much matter. Enough that, with limited resources, he gave us music full of charm—not great music, perhaps, but such as the ear loves to dwell upon, and the musician loves to contemplate. The general style of the symphony in B flat is not the style which may rightly be called Schubert's own. It suggests, rather, that period in the composer's life when, as regards instrumental music, he was strongly influenced by Haydn and Mozart. How strong that influence was appears more and more as his works become known. The theme tempts us to enquire in what degree the great masters—Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven—contributed to form the manner we commonly recognise as Schubert's; but, reserving this discussion, it must suffice now to point out that very little in the B flat symphony is distinctive of the author. The first Allegro, and the Andante con moto—especially the latter—are eminently Mozartian. Here and there, it is true, Schubert's individuality peeps out, as when, in the Allegro, he coquets between the minor and major cadence, after a fashion instantly recognised as his own; but these slight exceptions apart, the movements are clearly inspired by the great composer of the Jupiter. The Scherzo and Finale are as clearly Haydnesque. Indeed, it would be very easy to find in Haydn's symphonies the "double" of the Trio; while the theme and the working of the Finale have all the geniality and freshness, if not all the art, of the "father of the orchestra." Mr. Grove recognizes this, and says, "Schubert himself is not so prominent, and if we have Haydn's gaiety, we more than once catch a glimpse of Haydn's perruque." Merci bien, Mr. Grove, for this cheap and somewhat used up sneer at the old master, who, as you very well know, was one of the greatest reformers music ever had, and one of the most progressive among musicians. If by perruque you mean that Haydn's music is orderly, and in good form, in short, the work of an artist, we accept the term, and avow our preference for perruques over the wild unkempt shock heads of hair which in these later days are supposed to accompany and indicate genius. This, en passant, after the manner of Mr. Grove's sneer, and now to our theme again. Should it be asked if, under the circumstances we have pointed out, the Symphony in B flat will live in public favour? we answer that, while a place among great works of its kind cannot be hoped for, it must ever remain an object of interest, not merely for the charm of its music, but also for the light it throws upon Schubert's artistic career. With regard to the latter point we will put one suggestive question:—The Fifth Symphony is concise and in admirable form; whence, then, came the diffuseness and inartistic construction of later works? It need hardly be said that the performance under Mr. Mann's direction was all that could be desired, and we wish it were not requisite to add that the audience listened with very few signs of lively interest and applauded very slightly.

The reference above made to Mr. John Francis Barnett was not made without a purpose, inasmuch as that gentleman conducted a new overture from his own pen at the concert given on Thursday by the British Orchestral Society. Such an overture was announced in the Society's prospectus, and naturally excited interest among those who have watched Mr. Barnett's career with sympathy. It professes to illustrate Shakespeare's Winter's Tale; but its object, we are told, is less to "represent step by step the action of the drama than to depict those principle features in which, chiefly, its character is set forth." All this, however, may be dismissed from the mind, because, heard without the help of an interpreter, the music no more suggests the Winter's Tale than it suggests As You Like It, or The Merry Wives of Windsor. We decline to consider any vagueness in this respect as a drawback. The overture must stand or fall according as it has, or has not, musical merit. Whether it duly sets forth the adventures of Perdita and Florizel is another and very subordinate matter, notwithstanding the fact that, if the rage for "programme music" goes on as now, we are likely to have musical illustrations of the Books of Euclid. Mr. Barnett's overture begins with an Andante con moto, the theme and character of which reminds us of the introduction to the Ancient Mariner. This is the weakest part of the work; and the Allegro Vivace which follows it comes as a welcome change. Mr. Barnett has developed the Allegro at much length, once interrupting it by a reprise of the Andante theme. His music is brilliant and effective, if neither very original nor very striking; while the scoring throughout shows much excellent taste, and the facile hand of one who knows his work. We cannot say that the overture has shown us more of the composer than we had seen before, but it unquestionably strengthens his claim to be considered a man of ability. Mr. Barnett conducted with animation, and at the close was unanimously called back to the platform amid loud applause.

AMSTERDAM.—Herr and Mdme. Joachim took part in the fourth Felix Meritis Concert. It is superfluous to say that the room was crowded in every part, and the applause enthusiastic.—Herr Hans von Bülow has been here. He gave two concerts. At the first, a "Beethoven Concert," the programme included the following compositions by that composer: Sonata, Op. 27, No. 2; Variations, Op. 34; Sonata, Op. 31, No. 3; Sonata, Op. 110, 32 Variations in C minor; Capriccio, Op. 129; and Sonata, F minor, Op. 57. The programme of the second concert comprised pieces by Bach, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin, and Beethoven.—Herr Jean Becker and his Florentine Quartet have likewise paid this town a visit.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1873.

MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD.

THE final appearance of this great pianist, on Tuesday last, has naturally been the great musical event of the week. That it has caused universal regret need hardly be said, because in cases of this sort, as in many others, the full value of a treasure only appears when the owner is called upon to give it up. We do not exaggerate in saying that for twenty years Arabella Goddard has been emphatically a rich possession of English music-lovers. She has played to them as no one else ever did; she has taught them concerning composers and compositions of whom and of which they would otherwise, in all probability, have remained ignorant; and in all other ways she has proved herself a "good and faithful servant." There may have been times when the public failed to show a due appreciation of her work—times, for example, when newer lights have shone in our musical firmament. But, as last Tuesday proved, our English pianist kept her hold upon the affections of her compatriots, and only the rumour of her loss was needed to demonstrate the fact. So good cometh out of evil; and thus it is that adversity, "though like a toad, ugly and venomous, yet doth wear a precious jewel in his head." Henceforth, it cannot be said that the English public failed to set a proper value upon English art, and Madame Goddard's leave-taking will be a stimulus to all who, like her, strive to discharge well their duty. We might easily fill all our space with eulogy of the incomparable artist whom we have just lost; but, under the circumstances, we prefer to quote the language of our contemporaries; beginning with the great journal which, for reasons needless to explain, has kept long silence respecting her claims to public consideration:—

(From "The Times.")

Madame Arabella Goddard's farewell concert, given on Tuesday night in St. James's Hall, was one of extraordinary interest. No name for the last twenty years has been more familiar to musical amateurs than that of the lady who has now bid adieu to them for ever. What it might have been hardly necessary to say while she was constantly appearing before them may, on such an occasion, be stated without reserve. Proficient in every school, Madame Goddard is excelled in none. Her general culture, indeed, is almost without precedent. Not only has she, in the course of her long and distinguished career, mastered all the important works of the greatest acknowledged composers—from Bach and Handel to Mozart, from Mozart to Beethoven, Schubert, Hummel, Moscheles, Weber, Mendelssohn, and Sterndale Bennett—but she also acquainted herself, and, through her performances, acquainted the musical public, with those of men like Woelfl, Dussek, Steibelt, &c., who, comparatively "sidera minora," were, nevertheless, giants in their day. Further than this, leaving what is termed "classic" out of the question, there is, now that their author is dead, no one who can perform the fantasias of Sigismond Thalberg with the same fluency, grace, and irreproachable mechanism as Madame Goddard. The renowned virtuoso himself imparted to her the secret of how to interpret them, and his instructions were the more easily taken advantage of on account of her early studies in Paris, under Kalkbrenner, who, as a methodical teacher for young aspirants, never had a rival, and who often boasted, with pride, that he had made two pianists, Marie Pleyel and Arabella Goddard—"une Pleyel en herbe," as he was wont to say.

But what is of most interest, now that Madame Goddard has resolved to give up public playing, is her artistic career in England. This, however, need not be described in detail. From her first achievement, in 1858, at the concerts of the Quartet Association (conducted by M. Sainton), when she played from memory the long, elaborate, and, to nineteen pianists out of twenty, almost impracticable sonata of Beethoven, in B flat, Op. 106, to her most recent exhibitions in public, she has only to look back to an uninterrupted series of triumphs. At the Philharmonic Societies, "Old" and "New," at the Birmingham Festivals, at the Crystal Palace concerts, and, last not least, at the Monday Popular Concerts, she has been a recognized "star of the first magnitude." And justly so; seeing that, as an English artist, she has, like a veritable champion, maintained the honour of musical England, holding her own against all comers. Even when—a girl of scarcely twenty—she made a tour in Germany, she was the first who ever attempted the great sonata of Beethoven already mentioned, her performance of which was recorded in a long and elaborate article by the celebrated critic, Rellstab, one of Beethoven's friends. To cite merely a paragraph or two, Herr Rellstab says:—"Only those who, by careful study, have obtained an insight into the difficult and complicated nature of this work, are fully capable of appreciating the extraordinary and masterly performance of Miss Arabella Goddard." * * * *

"One thing is certain—it is a most stupendous task for the pianist; and the young and highly-gifted lady has the threefold merit of having played it first in Germany; of being a lady who did so; and of having accomplished her task with a fluency and perfection in which it is doubtful if any man ever equalled, much less surpassed her." This eulogy, addressed to an English pianist by one of the most experienced and uncompromising of German critics, is at least worth quoting. That Madame Goddard is the most popular artist in this country who has ever had to trust to fingers, rather than to voice, for popularity, is unquestionable; and the fact is the more gratifying to reflect upon because her popularity has been used so largely for good to the art of which she is, in her line, beyond all comparison, the most distinguished existing representative.

That Tuesday evening's concert—the "Farewell" of so universal a favourite—should have excited an unusual degree of public interest is not surprising. Never was St. James's Hall crowded by a more enthusiastic audience, and never was a concert more thoroughly enjoyed. On such an occasion the programme will hardly be uninteresting to our musical readers; we, therefore, subjoin it:—

PART I.

|---|---|
| Quartet in F, Op. 77, No. 2. ... ... ... ... ... | Haydn |
| Song. "O, swallow, swallow" ... ... ... ... ... | Piatti. |
| "If with all your hearts" (Elijah) ... ... ... | Mendelssohn. |
| Sonata, "Ne Plus Ultra" (pianoforte) ... ... ... | Woelfl. |

PART II.

|---|---|
| Sonata, in D major, Op. 58, Pianoforte and Violoncello | Mendelssohn. |
| Song "Le Moine" ... ... ... ... ... ... ... | Meyerbeer. |
| Air, "Adelaida" ... ... ... ... ... ... ... | Beethoven. |
| Trio, in G major, for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello | Haydn. |

How Madame Goddard plays the Ne Plus Ultra sonata of Woelfl, which she was the first to introduce, at her own "Recitals," and subsequently at the Monday Popular Concerts, is well known; and how, when associated with Signor Piatti, she executes the splendid violoncello sonata of Mendelssohn is equally familiar to frequenters of the Monday Popular Concerts. Enough that on this important occasion she played her best—which is equivalent to saying the best of the best. After Woelfl's sonata, being thrice called back, she resumed her seat at the pianoforte, and gave the fantasia of her early master, Thalberg, on the English melody, "Home, sweet home." Of Haydn's genial and animated trio we need only say that it wound up the concert with éclat. After it, Madame Goddard was twice enthusiastically called forward, and applauded "to the echo."

The singers were Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Santley. Mr. Lloyd was recalled after "Adelaida," in which he was accompanied by Madame Goddard. Mr. Santley was encored in both his songs, in the first of which he was accompanied on the violoncello by the composer, and for the second of which he substituted the serenade in Don Giovanni. The quartet of Haydn was admirably performed by Messrs. Carrodus, Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti, the first and last of whom were Madame Goddard's associates in Haydn's trio. The accompanist at the pianoforte was Sir Julius Benedict—facile princeps.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

On Tuesday night last, in St. James's Hall, a distinguished and remarkable artist bade farewell to the public of London. It has often to be said, as regards the musical profession, that "superfluous lags the veteran on the stage;" but Madame Arabella Goddard, reversing this order of things, makes her exit while in the prime of life, and in the zenith of her powers. The reasons for this unusual course are not stated, and they can form no matter for speculation or discussion here; but the fact itself is one calling for sincere regret. It is not often that an English pianist wins the high distinction so long enjoyed by Madame Goddard; still less often does an artist equally gifted achieve so much in the cause of art. For twenty years the lady who made her final bow last night has been the champion pianist of England, and the ready and willing servant of whatever worthy composer or worthy composition deserved a hearing. The public memory is unfortunately short, and it may be that few have a just conception of the significance appertaining to last night's proceedings. For the behoof of all the world, save that hypothetical few, we will sketch, in brief terms, the course of Madame Goddard's artistic career.

Born at St. Saens, in the South of France, in 1836, Arabella Goddard showed surprising aptitude for music at a very early age, and, when six years old, was taken to Paris for the benefit of Kalkbrenner's instruction. Under that distinguished master, to whose admirable system her great executive powers owe not a little, Miss Goddard made such progress that, after two years' study, she appeared in public, performing on the occasion one of Hummel's concertos. The child being brought to London in 1846, Mrs. Anderson first, and next the late Thalberg, continued the work Kalkbrenner had begun; fantasias and music of a like class serving meanwhile to exhibit Miss Goddard's precocious ability in public. Her first important début took place at the "National Concerts," conducted by the late Balfe, at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1850, when the young artist performed, with great success, the music of Hummel and other popular writers for her instrument. The year following, Miss Goddard was placed, on Thalberg's recommendation, under the care of Mr. J. W. Davison, who at once discerned his pupil's great capacity for more serious work than had before engaged her attention. So speedily did the young pianist profit by the counsels of her master, that her real début as a classical player took place in 1858, at one of the New Philharmonic Concerts, then given in Exeter Hall, under Lindpaintner's direction. The work played on that occasion was the Concerto in C minor (No. 3), of Sterndale Bennett, who marked his sense of the artist's ability by presenting her with a handsome souvenir. From this time Miss Goddard led an active life—constantly adding new classical works to her repertory, and producing them at "Recitals" given by herself, or at public concerts where she was engaged. The name of those works is legion; selected with rare acumen from the then little known compositions of Dussek, Woelfl, Steibelt, Pinto, and other masters of equal rank. At this time also Miss Goddard brought forward the later sonatas of Beethoven, which very few artists cared to play. Her crowning achievement in connection with those great works took place at a concert of the excellent and too short-lived Quartet Association, established by Messrs. Sainton and Cooper, when she played from memory the Sonata in B flat (Op. 106)—a task no pianist had ever ventured to essay before a public audience. Miss Goddard repeated this memorable effort at Berlin, in 1855, and received from Herr Rellstab, the eminent critic, and friend of Beethoven, such praise as was due to a young artist who, coming from an "unmusical country" to musical Germany, successfully accomplished a task shunned by all Beethoven's compatriots. Having returned to England in 1856, Miss Goddard resumed her favourite work of reviving neglected masterpieces. In rapid succession she made the public acquainted with the fugues of Bach, Handel, and Scarlatti; the "Plus Ultra" sonata and concertos in G minor and in E flat of Dussek, the C minor sonata of Woelfl, and other works of like value. How, later, she added novelty after novelty to the programmes of the Monday Popular Concerts; was the first to play Mendelssohn's posthumous compositions; revived the name of Friedemann Bach, Eberlin, and many another half-forgotten worthy, and persistently vindicated the genius of our own composer, Sir Sterndale Bennett—all these things must be fresh in the public mind. It is impossible to look back upon such a career without admiration, and without a consciousness that the retirement of such an artist is a loss to music not easily overrated. As regards Madame Goddard's place among pianists, and with respect to her distinctive gifts, very much might be said were it necessary to assert the dignity of the one or the rare value of the other. But, though this is not necessary, we may be allowed, at such a time as the present, to recall the peculiar merits which have given Madame Goddard an abiding place in the annals of her art. Of her wonderfully correct execution it boots not to speak at length. Difficulties never seemed difficulties, as she surmounted them with the ease of one who moves along a plain and beaten path; while the keenest ears listened vainly for a false note or a sign of hesitation. Not less remarkable was her command over gradations of tone, from the faintest whisper to the loudest thunder of the Broadwood "Grand;" and no connoisseur has ever heard Mdme. Goddard play a rapid scale passage, pianissimo, without recognising a triumph of executive art. On a par with this mechanical ability we place the great and laudable conscientiousness which prompted her always to reverence the composer whose interpreter she became. At a time when new "readings" were the fashion, and the credit of originality was sought at the expense of truth, Madame Goddard never swerved from the straight path of an obvious duty. Her business was to know the mind of the composer, and, knowing it, to represent his ideas with such faithfulness as was possible. This business, neither more nor less, she steadily pursued. It has often been charged against Madame Goddard that her playing wanted warmth, and was deficient in expression. We can understand the charge when made by that large class of the public who hear with their eyes, because it must have seemed impossible that an artist touching every chord of musical feeling with a calm, impassive face, and well-nigh motionless figure, could herself have felt. But those who listened only with their ears were conscious of no deficiency in the subtle power through which a musical artist can excite the imagination and work upon the emotions. To them Beethoven spoke, when she interpreted, with all his passion and all his pathos; Schubert moved them with his plaintive tenderness, and Mendelssohn charmed them with his courtly and cultured grace. By such connoisseurs Madame Goddard was regarded as the finished artist, who left nothing to desire. But enough of eulogy, however much the occasion warrants it. Madame Goddard has quitted public life in England, and we cannot but feel that the chances of our boasting another such pianist, equipped for a career of equal usefulness, are small indeed.

The concert given last night was attended by a crowd which filled the Hall in every part, and was thoroughly in sympathy with the occasion. A programme, framed on the Monday Popular model, had been drawn up, comprising Haydn's Quartet in F (Op. 77), Woelfl's "Ne Plus Ultra" Sonata, Mendelssohn's Sonata in D for piano and violoncello, and Haydn's pianoforte Trio in G. The concerted works, in which Madame Goddard was assisted by Messrs. Carrodus, Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti, were all capitally played and much applauded; but, as need scarcely be said, the event of the evening was the performance of Woelfl's Sonata. A storm of applause greeted Madame Goddard's appearance, and this encouraged her to play as she has only played before on exceptional occasions. The result was two enthusiastic recalls, and after that a third summons, to which the artist responded with Thalberg's "Home, sweet home." Madame Goddard also accompanied Beethoven's "Adelaida;" joined Signor Piatti in Mendelssohn's Sonata; and, as a final act, took part in Haydn's trio, at the close of which the crowded audience bade her farewell with an earnestness of feeling she is not likely to forget. We should add that Mr. Santley sang Piatti's "Swallow, swallow, flying south." and Meyerbeer's "Le Moine"—both encored; that Mr. Lloyd was substitute for Mr. Reeves in "If with all your hearts," and "Adelaida;" and that Sir Julius Benedict accompanied all the vocal music in his own perfect way.

We understand that Madame Goddard will shortly leave England on an artistic tour through the Australian Colonies, California, the Eastern States, and Canada.

(From "The Morning Advertiser.")

In the course of a few weeks Madame Arabella Goddard will be on her way to Australia. She will go to the Colonies as the representative pianist of the old country, and the presence of such a perfect artist can do no less than exercise a beneficial effect upon the musical taste of the community on the other side of the world. Madame Goddard can ill be spared from London; for, although pianoforte players abound, there are few who unite in themselves every quality which constitutes a really great artist. There are degrees of excellence in pianists as in poets and painters, and a truly perfect development in either is a rare exception. So it must always remain; and the departure, for a considerable period, of one allowed to be irreproachable as an exponent of classical music, will leave a gap very difficult to fill up. Madame Arabella Goddard's way is prepared for her in the Australian Colonies, or wherever she may go; and we cannot doubt that musical culture in the most remote English-speaking countries or dependencies is sufficiently advanced to make her triumph sure and certain. The good-will of the English public will follow her, and will be accompanied by wishes for her speedy return; though some time must elapse ere Madame Goddard can be heard again in London. A voyage to Australia is a very different thing from a few weeks' trip to America; but whenever the lady may re-appear after her colonial expedition, it will not be a day too soon for her many admirers at home. On Tuesday night last Madame Goddard bade farewell to London at a concert arranged on the model of the Monday Populars. St. James's Hall was the locality, and the audience was more than ordinarily numerous. Haydn's Quartet in F, for strings, Op. 77, No. 2, was played by Mr. Carrodus, Herr L. Ries, Mr. Zerbini, and Signor Piatti, with the exception of that admirable violinist, Mr. Carrodus, a familiar Monday Popular group of artists. The same composer's Trio in G major, for piano, violin, and violoncello, was played by Mdme. Goddard, Mr. Carrodus, and Signor Piatti. Woelfl's Sonata, "Ne Plus Ultra," Op. 41, was the solo chosen by Mdme. Arabella Goddard, who first introduced it at the Monday Populars. Naturally enough the pianist was heard at her best on Tuesday night, and her rendering of the Sonata was as perfect an example of pianoforte playing as can well be conceived. The passages of double notes for both hands in the Allegro moderato were given with clearness, precision, and a deliciously crisp touch. Nothing was lost, slurred, or compromised; and the whole performance of this movement was a triumph of art. The variations on "Life let us cherish" were also given with every possible gradation of light and shade, and the third in particular served to show the pianist's extreme delicacy of touch. A storm of applause followed the performance, and Madame Goddard, being summoned to the platform a second time, responded to the compliment with Thalberg's arrangement of "Home, sweet home." The pianist was again heard, with Signor Piatti, in Mendelssohn's fine Sonata in D major for pianoforte and violoncello.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

We are always glad to welcome Mr. Henry Leslie's prospectus, especially when it is full of promise of good things drawn from the repertory which belongs as of right to Mr. Leslie's excellent choir. With regard to that choir, the good work it has done, and the superb manner of its doing, not a word need be said. Let us go at once to the prospectus of the eighteenth season. Four concerts will be given—on February 27, March 27, April 24, and May 29, respectively. In the first programme will be a selection from the works of Italian and English composers ranging from Marenzio on the one hand, down to Sir S. Bennett on the other. Sacred music will exclusively be given at the second concert; madrigals and part-songs by Sir H. Bishop and contemporaries at the third; and the fourth will be devoted to the director's benefit, Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Santley being engaged to appear. A better or more interesting scheme could not have been drawn up.

As early as the fifteenth century, there was a permanent theatre at Metz, and on the same site as the present building. According to the town chronicles, The Apocalypse of St. John was presented there in 1412; The Wonderful Deeds of the Arch-Angel Michael, in 1480; and The Life of Job, in 1513. We see from the above that the pieces were founded on Biblical subjects, and the authors would—if they could—turn in their graves, were they to know the style of pieces performed on the same spot in later times. Since the theatre has again become German, however, Offenbach, and others of the same kidney, have not had it all their own way as formerly; something higher has been introduced into the bills, and the German performances were inaugurated with Schiller's Maria Stuart.

The following story is "going the round" in America:—

"A meeting recently took place between Mr. Boucicault and a 'friend of his from the West:' The latter called at the inn which shelters the dramatist, and sent up his card, writing thereon, 'pressing business.' The dramatist 'saw' that card, and hastily rising from his position of repose, inserted his figure into one of Poole's most tasteful draperies, and awaited the up-coming apparition. The critire stranger entered, and grasping 'both fives' of Mr. B., observed: 'Mr. Boucicault, I have long been an admirer of yours. I have seen you play here in Bolton, London, Dublin, and New York; I hail from Chicago. I have called to tell you this to your face, and to say that I should like to borrow ten dollars.' The dramatic author, appreciating the neat style of the man of the West, extended to him the desired greenback, and the twain parted, never, never to meet again."

Dexter Smith says he is in no way responsible for the truth of this anecdote. Dexter Smith is wise, because we saw it recently in the Paris Figaro, with Alexander Dumas as its hero.

A little while ago the head of a lecture bureau in Boston received a letter from a small western village, inquiring for how much the lecture committee of the place could engage "that German singer, Lucky, with a good support for a couple of concerts?" To this the gentleman addressed replied:—

"My Dear Sir,—To engage that German singer, Lucky, with a good support, for a couple of concerts, I fear you would be compelled to mortage your entire town, to say nothing of the outlying farms. If you decide to conclude the arrangement I shall be pleased to serve you.—Very truly,

"———."

The lecture agent has not yet been heard from.

THE following remarkable example of fine writing appeared lately in the Daily State Journal of Richmond, Va. The artist spoken of is Mdlle. Carlotta Patti :—

"She is one of those rare, song-inspired spirits, in whom there is a perpetual fountain of delight, ever springing up fresh and full, and pouring the richness of its treasures on all things around her; giving us a relish of higher enjoyment than we ever deemed possible of attainment in ourselves, though we find it constantly attainable in her. Her music is like the outbreakings of joy in birds, after the descent of storms, and when nature has come suddenly forth from deep shade into open sunshine. There is a charm in it that is not art, but nature. It stirs and elevates, melts and soothes, awes and inspires precisely as if an inspiration of nature moved us within the most sacred and inner precincts of her temple. It is a revelation of what we would be ourselves, if we could only reach the expandings and aspirings of the higher nature within us. Mdlle. Patti is so full of music that, in her merriment, she can't help laughing it right out, just as a bird runs up a scale of joy in an ecstatic trill. Laughing, it is music; sighing, it is music; weeping, it is music; for, in whatever mood, her heart flows out in joyousness or sorrow, just as her audience is to be moved by the particular spell upon its spirit."

Not bad of its kind, we must admit—but the kind!

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

BLACKHEATH.—A concert was given in the Alexandra Hall, on the 4th inst., by Mr. Ridley Prentice, whose Brixton "Monthly Popular Concerts" we have more than once had occasion to notice in commendatory terms. Mr. Prentice has recently accepted the appointment of organist of Christ Church, Lee Park, the congregation of which, with the neighbouring gentry, were well represented at his concert. The programme embraced several items of a classical character, notably Haydn's pianoforte Trio in G, No. 1; Woelfl's "Ne Plus Ulta" Sonata; a Sonata for Violoncello by Marcello; Mendelssohn's pianoforte Trio in C minor; and violin and piano solos by Tartini, Schubert, and Schumann. These works, entrusted to the careful interpretation of Messrs. Prentice, Holmes, and Piatti, were executed in the most irreproachable manner, whilst the warm plaudits which rewarded their conscientious efforts at the termination of each performance indicated a thorough appreciation of the musical feast. The vocalists who contributed to the entertainment were Miss Ellen Horne and Madame Patey, the last-named of whom included amongst her songs an expressive sacred air, entitled "Hear my prayer," written by the bénéficiaire.

MR. HALLETT SHEPPARD gave a performance of his new "Mass of St. Wilfrid," for male voices and organ, to a numerous audience, on Monday evening, at St. Mary's Chapel, Sloane Street. Although the real effect of such a work can only be properly estimated when in connection with a religious service, the performance afforded great satisfaction to those present, and the work is highly creditable to Mr. Hallett Sheppard as a composer of Church music. Amongst the different movements demanding particular notice is the "Kyrie," with its sweet and captivating melody; the "Credo," in which the "Incarnatus est" is especially effective; also the "Benedictus" and "Agnus Dei." In the latter the charming motive of the "Kyrie" is again happily introduced. We omit to mention the exquisite "Offertorium" (a movement for organ solo in G major), the subject of which is treated in musician-like style. This highly symphonic movement might, indeed, be scored for a full band, and produce great effect as an instrumental piece. That Mr. Hallett Sheppard, who is known as one of our best organ-players, gave it to perfection, need scarcely be mentioned. The "Mass" was finely sung by a select chorus of male voices; and we congratulate Mr. Hallett Sheppard on the deserved success of his new work, which, under the present restrictions in the Roman Catholic Chapels, will be of great value to their choirs.

BREMEN.—At the fifth of the so-called Private Concerts, the programme included Symphony, in G minor, No. 4, Raff; Overture to Coriolan, Beethoven, and Overture to Euryanthe, Weber. Madame Hallwachs-Heintz, from Berlin, played Schubert's "Wandererphantasie," as arranged by Liszt, and a Fantasia by the same composer on motives from Mendelssohn's music to a Midsummer Night's Dream. Herr Schelper was the vocalist.

MILAN.—The general rehearsals of Senor Gomez's new opera: Fosca, commenced at the Scala some short time since. The work ought to be produced within a few days, but the management has been so unlucky this season—some of the papers say it is under the influence of the jettatura, or "evil eye"—that it is impossible to say when the event will really come off, or whether it will even come off at all. After Fosca, Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin is set down for production. It is said that Herr Wagner will himself come and conduct, but anent the last point, namely, that of Herr Wagner's presence here, grave doubts are entertained by many.

PROVINCIAL.

DEVONPORT.—Mrs. John Macfarren, the eminent London pianist, assisted by two accomplished vocalists, Miss Agnes Drummond (soprano) and Mr. Henry Guy (tenor), gave a very attractive little concert on Wednesday, February 5th. Mrs. Macfarren's playing of a varied selection of pieces by the best composers was warmly appreciated, and she responded to a vociferous encore for Brissac's Fantasia on Welsh melodies, by repeating the concluding theme, "The March of the Men of Harlech." Miss Drummond's and Mr. Guy's admirable singing of the duets, "Mira la bianca luna" (Rossini), "Da quel dì" (Donizetti), and "O Maritana" (Wallace), were prominent features in the programme. Miss Drummond won an encore in the late Tom Cook's "Over hill, over dale." Mr. Guy had to repeat his own pretty ballad, "Philomel," and Mr. G. A. Macfarren's "My own, my guiding star."

PLYMOUTH.—The members and friends of the Mechanics' Institute were treated to a musical entertainment last evening, the like of which they have not had the pleasure of listening to for some time past. The large hall was well filled, the audience being gathered together, no doubt, through the intimation that the concert would be by distinguished artists, and that any were disappointed in their expectations of a good entertainment, cannot for a moment be believed. Miss Agnes Drummond (soprano), Mr. H. Guy (tenor), and Mrs. John Macfarren (pianist), each in their several efforts, were loudly and repeatedly applauded, and the execution of various pieces on the piano, performed in a most accomplished manner, elicited a spontaneous burst of approval at the conclusion of each.

LEAMINGTON.—On Wednesday last, Mr. Klitz gave a lecture on the "Science of Music and its Influences on Society," at Leamington. The Chronicle of Saturday says:—

"Mr. Klitz commenced his subject by alluding, in a highly intellectual address, to the power of music, its general characteristics, and enlivened his lecture by very useful and forcible anecdotes. We may truthfully say that Mr. Klitz is a pianist of no common order, and his vocal illustrations were performed in the most finished style, and fully showed the accomplished master of his art. In his hands, also, the concertina is made to produce the most charming effects of which this popular instrument is capable. He elicited universal applause throughout the entertainment."

The Leamington Courier spoke in the highest terms of the playing of Mr. Klitz.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me, through your columns, to plead the cause of one in deep distress, with the circumstances of whose case I have just been made acquainted.

Mr. G. R. G. Pringle (formerly a chorister at St. Margaret's Chapel, Marylebone), who was decidedly one of the leading musicians in Melbourne, and respected alike for his amiability of character, readiness to assist those in need, and high moral worth, owing to the critical state of his wife, returned to Europe some time since, in the forlorn hope of saving her life. The inevitable expenses of the voyage and a lengthened stay in this country made extensive demands upon his pecuniary resources; but the object of his journey attained, and his wife happily restored to health—like the true artist he was—before returning to the Antipodes, he sought to avail himself of the pre-eminent advantages afforded by a course of study in the world-renowned art-centre of Leipzig, where (to quote from a letter I have received from the English chaplain) "he sunk into a premature grave, after lengthened and costly sickness, leaving his wife and four children (two of them under five) literally destitute in a strange land." The Rev. Mr. Whitford goes on to say:—"Her best, if not sole, hope for the future is to take her children back to their birthplace, i.e., Melbourne, where her brother can help her, and the high repute and cherished name of the dead artist will help them as nowhere else."

The cost of the voyage, at the lowest possible estimate, will amount to £100, and it is important that they should sail one month hence. In the hope that those whom fortune has favoured in their artistic career will not forget others less prosperous, thus suddenly deprived of their natural protector, and cast helpless on the world, I venture to ask, under such exceptionally painful circumstances, if you will spare me space for the insertion of this appeal. I may add that the Rev. Upton Richards, All Saints, Margaret Street; G. A. B. Beecroft, Esq., 4, Gloucester Terrace, Regent's Park; Messrs. Chappell & Co., 50, New Bond Street, and Messrs. Cramer & Co., 201, Regent Street, W., have kindly consented to receive and acknowledge any contributions sent to them. Donations may also be forwarded to Rev. R. W. Whitford, Elisen Strasse, 17 b.i., Leipzig, or to me.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

AM I TO DIE?

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—Knowing your kind feeling towards those who have fallen from the pinnacle of fame, through caprice or fashion, or pushed off the high-road into the "Slough of Despond," by some gaudy, over-dressed, flimsy trickster, I appeal to you, Sir, to help me out of my truly deplorable condition. I had friends once; they, like shadows, have departed, and have left names that will live, while those who have hustled me out of sight and sound will be forgotten, but who are now flourishing their flimsy finery, and, without a blush of shame, sending forth crudities and nudities that would have been hissed off the stage when my friends, Balfe, Wallace, Barnett, and a host of others, flourished the bâton, who never degraded themselves by pandering to a debased taste! Who can charge my truest friend of all, Alfred Bunn, with stealing "Baron Nicholson's" (Judge and Jury Club) "Tit-bits," as he called them, or culling from the "Cyder Cellars" their "spicy ditties," or pilfering from the "Coal-hole" a shovelful of gross vulgarity? No, no! "Alfred" had a soul above "Music Halls" and "cellar-flaps," and did all he could to raise English authors, singers, and musicians to the position they ought to hold. Many a man has had a monument erected to his memory who deserves it less than the late Alfred Bunn. Whatever his shortcomings were, he was true to his countrymen, and fostered national talent.

I am homeless; why should I be when there is a fine house lying waste in the Haymarket, which only wants putting in order, and which could be done as readily as the building of the "Albert Hall?" If Her Gracious Majesty would only come forward and stretch out her helping hand, the nobles and wealthy of the land would soon take up the shares, and I should be again fostered and cared for, and in a short time repay with interest all the cost they may have been put to. Besides, Sir, I feel I have a claim upon my country. Why should such large sums of money be lavished and squandered, in some instances, upon my two sisters, "Art and Science," annually, while I am left totally unprovided for; in fact, never thought of? Is there no one bold enough to bring my claims before the House of Lords or Commons? What have I done, Sir, to be treated with such silent contempt? Is my sweet voice never to be heard again? Am I to be left to die?—Yours, &c.,

Miss English Opera.

THE OLD MAN'S DARLING.

(Copyright.)

Her mother was his early love,
Her sire his boyhood's friend;
And when they pass'd away, their child
The old man vow'd to tend.

She was the sunshine of his home,
A rose so fresh and gay,
That nestled to his lonely heart
More closely day by day.

And then she had her mother's smile,
Her eyes and golden hair,
And oft would smooth and kiss his brow,
And chase away a care.

What wonder then that to his heart
Crept back the love of old—
But autumn may not wed with spring—
He cherished it untold.

And when there came a seemly knight,
To woo her from his side,
The old man smiled upon him,
For her sake, his joy and pride.

But fickle was the knight and false
(A story threadbare old),
He woo'd her for a little while,
Then wed for lands and gold.

A blighted flow'r can bloom no more;
The old man wept one day,
As murmuring the name she lov'd,
His darling passed away.

He laid her by her mother's side,
Beneath a willow tree,
And carv'd upon a simple stone,
"God gave and took Marie."

ORGAN NEWS.

The following is a description of the organ built for St. Martin's Church, Leicester, by J. W. Walker & Sons. In the instrument has been incorporated the pipe work—2 sound boards, and bellows—of the original organ by Snetzler, of 2½ rows of keys, and 23 stops.

The instrument has four complete manuals, and an independent pedal organ. Pneumatic lever applied to great organ, swell organ, and couplers.

This noble instrument is now standing at the manufactory, Francis Street, Tottenham Court Road, where rehearsals were given on Saturday, Monday, and Tuesday last, by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Best.

Madrid.—Señor Salvadore Colantes, one of the best modern poets of Spain, has been commissioned to translate Dinorah into Spanish, so that Meyerbeer's popular work may be represented by Spanish artists.

Patriotic dramas would have a fair chance were they allowed in Schleswig-Holstein, where the love for Denmark is far from extinct. During the performance of a piece, called The Recruit, recently at Hadersleben, immense enthusiasm was created by the appearance on the stage of an actor wearing the Danish cockade. A policeman who was present hissed to no purpose, but the higher authorities suppressed the patriotic drama next day.

HERR R. WAGNER AT HAMBURGH AND BERLIN.

During a tolerably long experience of the world, we have found that the number of persons who hide their light under the proverbial bushel is exceedingly small. Such individuals there are, no doubt, but among them we certainly cannot class the Poet-Musician of the Future, the author of Opera and Drama, the composer of Lohengrin and Der Ring der Nibelungen. That Herr R. Wagner's good opinion of himself has not diminished is proved by what occurred at the second concert got up in this old Hanse Town by his admirers, for the purpose of raising funds towards the erection of the famous National-Festival-Stage-Play-Theatre at Bayreuth. The concert was most numerously attended, and Herr Wagner himself conducted. He received a warm welcome on making his appearance, and liberal applause followed each piece. At the conclusion of the concert, the composer was recalled several times, and, at last, to lend, we suppose, variety to the proceedings, made a few observations "in his own peculiar manner," as the Berlin Echo observes, "a manner which must appear strange to those not familiar with his mental conformation." This "manner," as readers of the Musical World cannot fail by this time to be aware, is the way he has of affirming, in season and out of season, that he, Richard Wagner, is every one, and that no other being is anybody. We do not require a careful analysis to prove that such is the gist of everything he has ever written or said; a very cursory glance at his writings, the reports of his speeches in public, or utterances in private, will prove this to be the fact. On the present occasion, he intended, perhaps, to thank the audience for the enthusiasm they had displayed in his cause, but his intention was, at any rate, not very clear, or strongly expressed. On the contrary, the principal characteristic of his speech was not gratitude to his hearers, but the self-sufficiency of a man who is convinced of the sacred nature of his mission, and is unable to understand how others can conceive or harbour a doubt about it. He observed that it was only by a small circle of friends that he had been invited to be present that day, but that he should leave with the conviction that the small circle had been greatly extended. He said that he left the Hamburghers as a legacy, on his departure, one thought: The thought of his magnanimous, grand, and significant enterprise. He exhorted them to make this their own; for the town of Hamburgh would suffer no dishonour by helping to build the new theatre. A great many of those present liked neither the gist nor the form of these remarks; they expected, at any rate, thanks and an acknowledgment of their zeal for art first, whatever might have followed in the way of egotism and self-laudation. Wagner, however, has long forgotten the use of honied words, and his admirers must be content to take him as he is, or turn from him altogether. Our contemporary above named says: "Who shall say whether his presence, the production of his works under his own personal direction, and his intercourse with the orchestra and the public, will have contributed to destroy the doubts as to his qualities as an artist, or whether people still fling at his head the charge of a dilettanteism, which alone, as such, attracts and amuses the great dilettante-mass? Wagner, however, is never unready, like the dilettante, who, though possessing the will to do something, always remains sticking at that point, and gets no further. What Wagner wishes to do, he is able to do; that is a fact we do not deny. That his employment of artistic resources is exaggerated, degenerating into ugliness, and frequently into distortion, is another thing. But it is by no means necessary to follow an individual like Wagner through thick and thin. He is a man like us all, and human imperfection vainly strives to attain the really Ideal; but that man is a great man who has effected more than the best among his fellows. This is the standard for measuring all human efforts; its adoption will preserve us from worshipping false idols, and from depreciating the truly eminent."

Among the pieces performed at the first concert the following were repeated at the second: the Prelude to Lohengrin, the Prelude to, and concluding movement of, Tristan und Isolde, the "Kaisermarsch," and Siegmund's "Love Song," from the opera of Die Walküre. The additional pieces were the overture to Tannhäuser, together with the "Hammer Song" and the "Smelting Song" from Siegfried. Some astonishment was expressed at the last two songs figuring in the programme of a concert; they can scarcely be conceived apart from the stage, for it is hardly possible that such realistic music can be adequately performed without stage accessories and "properties." The "Hammer Song" was encored. Herr Lederer sang it extremely well, though he lacked strength to hold his own against the rumbling orchestra. Herr Wagner took the allegro of the Tannhäuser overture at a pretty moderate tempo; other parts, however, he scampered through at a break-neck rate.

The following address relative to the above concerts was published in a local paper:—

"Israelites, Richard Wagner is here to superintend the performance of his own compositions. Richard Wagner is the author of the book: Judaism in Music. In that book he endeavours to bring Judaism into disrepute and trample it in the dust, though it is founded on honesty, and its supreme law is the moral law: 'Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife.' Israelites, be worthy the name of Israel. Far be from you any thought of attending such performances; show that you know your own value. Respect yourselves, if you would enjoy the esteem of your fellow citizens.—Jacopo Türkeim."

Herr Wagner has since repeated the same programme for the same purpose in the Concerthaus, Berlin, and with a highly satisfactory result for the funds of the National-Festival-Stage-Play-Theatre at Baireuth. Though a front seat cost five thalers, and a box a hundred, every place was taken. The Emperor himself was present the greater part of the evening. At the conclusion of the concert, Herr Wagner was greatly applauded, overwhelmed with flowers, and several times recalled. As a natural consequence, he made a speech, but, though it would certainly not lay him open to a charge of modesty, it was not quite so highly spiced with arrogance and overweening self-conceit as the one he delivered at Hamburgh.

MOZART AND SCHIKANEDER.

One fine morning, in the spring of 1791, Schikaneder, the manager of the Theater an der Wien, entered precipitately the little bedroom occupied by Mozart, who generally did not retire till late at night, and did not rise till an equally late hour next day.

"How can you possibly sleep away the whole morning, with such beautiful weather!" exclaimed the manager, in a hoarse voice.

Mozart, roughly roused by these words, sat up, and said: "Is breakfast ready, that you come so soon? Confound it," he continued, rubbing his eyes, and gazing fixedly at his friend, "You look very beaming and strange! What is the matter with you?"

Schikaneder's costume was in rather a disordered state; he had even forgotten to put on a neck-handkerchief. His dishevelled hair showed that the hair-dresser had not touched it, while over his face was spread an expression of joy mingled with a touch of anxiety and bitterness.

"What is the matter with me," replied Schikaneder, "you know what is the matter with me as well as I do. Debts and creditors—that is what is the matter with me. I have not closed an eye all night, and, if you do not help me, I am a lost man."

Mozart burst into a loud peal of laughter, in which his friend was nearly joining. "I must confess," he at length remarked, "that you have come to the right place for cash. Do you see that empty bottle? Well—I obtained it with Constance's money—she is so good. I cannot work without sleep, and I cannot sleep without wine. I really do not know how I shall sleep next week! Oh! you have called to ask me to extricate you from your difficulties. I suppose you did it for a joke,"

"Listen, Mozart," replied Schikaneder, in a serious tone; "I knew all that before I came. I have been thinking the matter over all night. Your purse is empty, but your heart is full; you have no money in your strongbox, but you have some in your pen. You must compose an opera for my theatre, and save me."

"My dear sir," replied Mozart, "the patient might die while the medicine was in preparation."

"Only pledge me your word and I am saved. Everyone knows that Mozart always keeps his word."

"Yes—but how about the libretto?"

"Oh, I will take that upon myself. I drew up the plot in the night."

"Oh, indeed! I should like to hear it."

Hereupon, Schikaneder told him a story, entitled Lulu, contained in a work by Wieland.

"Something may be made out of it," said Mozart, as he got up and began dressing. "But it will take time; it cannot be done in a moment."

"On the contrary, it must not take time; it must be done very quickly. You must begin this very day thinking over the situations and the isolated airs; as for the rest—music as well as words—I will answer for that. My prompter, Haselback, can write rhymes. I composed, long ago, some music which will do admirably. I will call the work The Enchanted Flute. I will establish a contrast between love triumphing over every obstacle, and hatred crawling like a reptile by its side. The whole will be somewhat mystical, so that certain persons shall not recognize themselves. You know Wieland's famous story, though; there, give me your hand, and let the thing be done in a month."

Mozart shook his hand; Schikaneder could not refrain from pressing him to his bosom and exclaiming: "My dear friend, you have saved my life. I would rather have killed myself than been a bankrupt."

Schikaneder's joy was very great, but it was somewhat damped, when, a fortnight afterwards, the manager of the Leopold Stadttheater announced: Caspar, the Hautboy Player, or the Enchanted Guitar, a fairy burletta, with vocal and instrumental music, and taken from the same story by Wieland. Schikaneder ran to his friend's with the sad news; but, instead of being discouraged, Mozart turned the occurrence to very good account.

"That is just what I want," he said. "Sarastro, the villain and despot, does not suit me at all; we must make him a kind of pontiff, a priest of wisdom, the grand-master of a lodge of masons; he shall sing the praises of peace and wisdom in a style half sacred and half profane. He will be a man of progress, sculptured on the antique model. As a general rule, vulgar ideas and vulgar personages do not please me; I do not like pieces merely interspersed with songs. I will write an opera; I promised I would, and I will keep my word."

"Do not be too serious," said Schikaneder. "You have been very fond of philosophising for some time past."

"That is because I am often thinking of death," replied Mozart, as he sat down at the piano. "Just listen; does that air please you?"

With these words, he sang Tamino's air: "Dies Bildniss ist bezaubernd schön." Having once begun, he went through the whole of the first act. Schikaneder was struck by the part of the Queen of Night, so brilliant vocally, and so insignificant dramatically. He alluded to the fact, and Mozart replied that he had had in his mind his sister-in-law, Madame Hofer, whom he recommended to his friend. Now, all this lady possessed was a fine voice, so Mozart had taken care she should disappear immediately after her grand and spirited air. Schikaneder gave an approving nod and left, shortly afterwards, though not without begging Mozart not to compose the part of Papageno before consulting him, as it was he who was going to play it. Mozart consented to everything. To be better within reach, he worked in a sort of summer-house belonging to the manager, and spent the whole day in his house. On one occasion, while sitting at table with his poet, Mozart said: "Well; shall I set your air? I am in the vein."

"Certainly," replied Schikaneder. Mozart turned up the cloth and began writing. In a few minutes, he presented the notes to the manager.

"That is too learned for me," said the latter, and Mozart immediately tore it up.

When the first bottle of champagne was emptied, Mozart repeated the question: "Will you have your air now?"

"Certainly," replied Schikaneder, half tipsy. Mozart leaned upon a bureau, and jotted down the notes.

"That is not simple enough for Papageno," remarked Schikaneder, looking over Mozart's shoulder.

"Confound it, what on earth do you want?" cried Mozart, tearing up the second sheet of paper. Hereupon, Schikaneder hummed a simple, nay, almost common air.

"You shall have it," replied Mozart, raising his voice, as he left the room. He remained absent a quarter of an hour, and, when he returned, he brought back also the duet: "Bei Männern welche Liebe fühlen." This time, Schikaneder was contented, and the champagne flowed freely till midnight. What a pity that the first songs were destroyed in the manner described!

But the poor manager was not at the end of his troubles. The Emperor Leopold was crowned at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, and the States of Bohemia summoned Mozart to Prague, and commissioned him to compose, as quickly as he could, an opera, La Clemenza di Tito, for a fête they intended giving in the Emperor's honour. Schikaneder, however was not discouraged, and, while awaiting his friend's return, sang Papageno's song to his creditors, and they promised they would wait. On the 12th September Mozart was back again in Vienna, and, on the 30th of the same month, the first performance of Die Zauberflöte took place, with the following cast: Tamino, Herr Schack; Sarastro, Herr Gerl; Die Königin der Nacht, Mdme. Hofer; Pamina, Madame Gottlieb; Pagageno, Schikaneder.

Mozart himself conducted, and Herr Henneberg, the usual conductor, took his place among the other musicians. When the audience called for the composer, it was a long time before he could be found. He had hidden himself in the prompter's box. The piece had a tremendous run, but Mozart did not long enjoy his triumph. He wrote his Requiem, and died on the 5th December, 1791, during a most severe frost. He was scarcely thirty-six, having been born on the 27th Jan., 1756.

Schikaneder paid Mozart a hundred ducats; as for himself, he soon became a rich man. He rebuilt his theatre, and on the forefront he had Papageno put with his Pan's pipe in his hand. It was for a long time believed in Germany, that Schikaneder stole the score of Die Zauberflöte. He was, in truth, one of the most ungrateful friends that ever lived. Luckily, now-a-days, the vice of ingratitude is disappearing more and more: people no longer do kindnesses.* A. Weill.

Mr. Longhurst is appointed organist of Canterbury Cathedral.

Mr. Nelson Varley, it is said, proposes to make Boston his home.

The "Boston Oratorio Class" are rehearsing the Woman of Samaria.

There are vacancies for three choristers (boys) in Peterborough Cathedral.

A Cincinnati critic affectionately alludes to "Rube, the piano-pounder." Rubenstein is meant.

The plates of Mr. P. S. Gilmore's "History of the Peace Jubilee" were destroyed by the great fire.

"Her little bed is empty!"—sequel to "Put me in my little bed—is the very latest popular sentimental song.

Carlotta Patti and troupe were on the cars at the recent terrible railway accident in Georgia. Their wardrobe and piano were destroyed. The artists were unhurt.

Mr. P. S. Gilmore has just received a present of silver plate from Mr. Dan Godfrey and the Grenadier Guards' Band of London, as a souvenir of their pleasant visit to Boston.

Mr. H. Weist Hill, the well known violinist of Her Majesty's Opera, and principal of the Royal Academy of Music, has received the important appointment of permanent conductor of music at the Alexandra Palace.

The seventh season of the Schubert Society is announced to commence on Wednesday next, under the able direction of Herr Schuberth, and the reputation it has already acquired will no doubt be honourably sustained.

A new modern comedy, written by a Manchester gentleman, a barrister, now practising in London, entitled The Two Lords, will be produced at the Prince of Wales' Theatre immediately after the withdrawal of Wilkie Collins' Man and Wife.

A lady—American, of course—writes that she wants a piece of music "with sentimental words that almost silently flow from the depths of concealed sorrow, revealing a sad heart's tenderest emotion in a tone that would melt an iceberg, and crumble adamant to dust."

The death of Mr. H. J. St. Leger, a gentleman for many years well known to the musical profession and to amateurs, is announced. He was buried on Wednesday at Kensal Green, near his old friends and compatriots Balfe and Wallace. Mr. St. Leger was in his 69th year.

* It is to be hoped that the last remark is merely a sort of rhetorical flourish; an attempt on M. Weill's part to wind up with what he considers a piece of smart writing, and not the result of his own experience. If M. Weill has really found men as bad as he here insinuates, we pity him, and are glad to say we have not.—Translator.

Sir Robert P. Stewart gave his fourth lecture on Irish Music, in the lecture hall, Trinity College, Dublin. It was full and fashionably attended. Her Excellency the Countess Spencer, accompanied by Lady Victoria Spencer, and attended by Captain Wynne Finch, were present.

We are requested by the authoress of "The music of the soul" to reprint the second verse, into which, as printed, an error had crept. The corrected verse runs thus:—

"It comes from Heav'n, and well I know
That such rich gifts are rare;
If used aright they purify,
Or else they prove a snare."

The amount of perversion of which the English language is capable, it was generally thought, had been settled by the writer on the World who perpetrates the news splinters. But the Boston Courier has a London correspondent who awakens new hopes. He writes that: "The costly Babil and Bijou is still running, and as a spectacle is magnificent, but as a dramatic production it marks the culminating point of the degeneracy from which it is to be hoped we are now beginning to emerge."—Arcadian.

Numerous friends of William Hamilton, Esq., being desirous of offering him a testimonial of esteem and respect on his retirement from the office of H. B. M. Consul at Boulogne-sur-Mer, which he has so worthily filled during a period of 57 years, a meeting to concert on the best means of carrying out this object was held on Monday, February 3rd, when an influential committee was formed. Messrs. Adams, Bankers of Boulogne, and Messrs. Coutts & Co., of London, will kindly receive subscriptions.

The late Mr. Balfe left an MS. opera, called The Knights of the Leopard, the libretto by Mr. A. Mattheson, based on Sir Walter Scott's romance. Madame Nilsson-Rouzeaud having expressed her readiness to play the principal part—the queen of Richard Cœur de Lion—it is proposed, if time should permit, to produce an Italian adaptation at Her Majesty's Opera, Drury Lane, during the forthcoming season. The score was left uncompleted by Mr. Balfe, but Sir Michael Costa has kindly edited it and added a finale, at the request of the widow.

Two paintings by Mr. R. Clothier, of Chepstow Place, Bayswater, have been lately exhibited at the Dublin Exhibition, the Society of British Artists, London, and the Birmingham School of Art, and met with much admiration. One is an excellent portrait of Mr. J. L. Toole, in his famous character of Caleb Plummer, in the "Cricket on the Hearth;" the other is from Goldsmith's "Haunch of Venison," representing the poet dining with Mr. and Mrs. Beau Tibbs. The former picture ought to adorn the walls of the Junior Garrick Club.—Bayswater Chronicle.

The Edinburgh Orchestral Festival commenced on Thursday, when Mdlle. Nita-Gaetano, Mr. W. Castle, Herr Straus, Mr. C. Hallé, and Madame Norman-Néruda were the leading artists, and there was an orchestra of seventy performers at each concert. On Saturday next, the 22nd, a grand morning concert is to be given under the auspices of the Choral Union. The artists of Her Majesty's Theatre, including Mdlle. Tietjens, Madame Sinico, Mdlle. Justine Macvitz, the new Polish mezzo-soprano, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Signors Tomberi, Borella, Campobello, and Agnesi, will appear.

When J. Grau opened his opera bouffé in Fourteenth Street, and produced Geneviève de Brabant, the Tribune said that no respectable lady who cared for her reputation would be seen at the entertainment. Six months afterwards the manager acknowledged in our hearing that his business had never quite got over that criticism, and that even then respectable ladies who attended his house held their heads down when they entered. Mr. Grau did not, however, bring an action against the Tribune, we are happy to say. The truth is, criticism is valuable only for the truth it contains. The world is very rapidly arriving at the conclusion that error acquires no additional force by reiteration, and that a truth is valuable whether uttered by a critic or evolved by a community.—New York Arcadian.

National Music Meetings at the Crystal Palace.—The £1,000 Challenge Prize—a magnificent cup and cover in silver gilt and enamel, Gothic style, standing three feet high—is to be publicly presented to the South Wales Choral Union, on Tuesday, the 25th inst., at the Crystal Palace. A deputation, consisting of L. L. Dillwyn, Esq., M.P., G. O. Morgan, Esq., M.P., T. Meyrick, Esq., M.P., W. Williams, Esq., M.P., with other M.P.'s and gentlemen connected with South Wales, will represent the choir at the ceremony, which it is expected will be the occasion of a large Welsh gathering in the centre transept. The deputation will be received by the directors of the company, with Mr. Thomas Hughes, M.P., at their head. Arrangements, we understand, are in progress to receive the cup at Aberdare on the Thursday following, with all fitting honours. The arrival of the artistic trophy in South Wales, and the enthusiasm it is likely to excite, will form an agreeable contrast to other matters lately connected with that part of the Principality.

A London journal informs us that Mme. Patti has been offered some interest in the direction of the Italian Opera at St. Petersburgh, and will therefore renounce her engagement to go to America. Stuttgart.—The Conservatory of Music, which is under the patronage of the King, received, last autumn, 170 new pupils. The number of pupils at the present moment is 488, being 35 more than last year. Of these, 177—namely 61 males, and 116 females—intend following music as a profession. 243 pupils belong to Stuttgart; 28 are from other parts of Würtemberg; 16 from Baden; 5 from Bavaria; 22 from Prussia; 1 from Alsace; 3 from the Saxon Duchies; 2 from Bremen; 3 from Hamburgh; 7 from Austria; 32 from Switzerland; 4 from France; 54 from Great Britain and Ireland; 9 from Russia; 1 from the Danubian Principalities; 1 from Turkey; 2 from Spain; 51 from North America; 2 from Africa; and 2 from Australia.—A monster concert has been given in the Theatre Royal for the benefit of the victims of the inundations in the Baltic. The performers were members of all the military bands in the Würtemberg Army Corps. The idea was started by Lieutenant General von Stülpnagel. An orchestra about 240 strong was formed from the bands of seven line regiments, one of which is quartered in Alsace, four cavalry regiments, the artillery brigade, and the pioneers; to these were added some fifty drummers and fifers. The opening piece in the first part of the programme was dedicated to the King of Würtemberg; that in the second to the Emperor of Germany; both pieces were played in full uniform, the performers wearing their helmets, which they laid aside when executing the other pieces in the programme. Herr Saro, of Berlin, conducted. The Court was present during the whole of the concert, which, in consequence of its great success, will probably be repeated.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine, (Longman & Co.,) they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from, Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. ## TESTIMONIAL TO MR. VAN PRAAG.

MR. VAN PRAAG, who has been for many years past well known to the members of the Musical Profession, and the public, as holding a responsible position at the principal Concert-rooms of the West End, is now, in his 74th year, and left without the means of sustenance and support. In addition to his failing health and strength, he has also recently become a widower, and is, by this sad bereavement, left alone, with not a relative in England to aid or take care of him. He has children in California who wish him to go out to them, and it is his own desire, notwithstanding his age and infirmities, to do so. Want of means for undertaking so long and expensive a journey, which his children are unable to supply, however, preclude the possibility of his leaving England. Under these sad circumstances, a few friends, well able to bear witness to his respectability, honesty, and courtesy in the discharge of the duties he has so "well and worthily fulfilled," are anxious to raise a Subscription in his behalf, to which contributions are earnestly and respectfully requested.

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May!
What joys attend thine advent gay!
On every tree the birdies sing,
From hill and dale glad echoes ring;
The lark, inspir'd, to Heav'n ascends,
The gurgling brook in beauty wends
By mossy bank and grassy brae,
Where violets bloom and lambkins play.
Delightful Spring—sweet month of May
What joys attend thine advent gay!

ANOTHER WORLD.*

(From the "Saturday Review.")

This is a very curious book, very clearly written, but the exact purport of which it is somewhat hard to understand. "Hermes," whose name appears on the title-page, is ostensibly the editor, not the author, of the fragments of which the work is composed, and which are all uttered by a sage who speaks in the first person, and who, we are to understand, was once, and perhaps is still, the ruler of a planet belonging to our solar system. How the editor received the communications of this mysterious person he does not profess to explain; but, either in solemn earnest or with grave sustained irony, he would urgently dissuade the reader from setting down any of the revelations to the account of a wandering imagination.

From what we have said, many readers in this table-rapping age will be inclined to think that we have here one of those spiritual manifestations which are fast taking a place among the bores of the period. But there is nothing in common between the random utterances of supposed spirits, and the plain, matter-of-fact, and even minute descriptions given by the sage in his fragments. Though he himself, as it seems, organised the polity by which his planet is governed, and though his narrative consists in a great measure of a record of his own legislative labours, there is nothing rhapsodical or enthusiastic in his style; he talks about his kingdom of Montalluyah, as a Japanese ambassador might talk about Japan. About a spiritual world he does not profess to discourse. The citizens of Montalluyah live longer than we do, but they are equally mortal—human beings to all intents and purposes, who, thanks to their legislator, have attained a degree of civilization superior in many respects to our own. In describing the manners and customs of this "other world," the narrator does not quit the topics to which earthly thinkers are accustomed. Health, education, marriage, the removal of disease, the prevention of crime, the employment of physical agencies, all come under consideration; and, however strange some of the "revelations" may be, they can seldom be called fantastic. "Hermes," indeed, far from wishing to be conspicuous as a dealer in the marvellous, seems to have published the words of his supposed instructor with a view of furnishing some useful hints to his less enlightened brethren, who, when they learn how things are managed in Montalluyah, may find reason for imitation:—

"Let all (he says in his preface) taste the fruit, though they do not behold the tree; profit by the diamonds, though they know not how they were extracted from the mine; accept what is found to be wholesome and fortifying in the waters, though the source of the river is unknown."

Montalluyah, then, we may assume, is a Utopia, but the account of it differs herein from that of many other Utopias, that apparently it is almost entirely devoid of satire. Nor is it the sole, though it is the chief, object of "Hermes" to hold forth a model of imitation. He describes animals, plants, and minerals to which nothing corresponds among the objects to be found on earth, and the gravity with which the descriptions are given is most remarkable. If, while repeating the words of the narrator, the "editor" is laughing in his sleeve at the reader, it must be admitted that the use of the sleeve is most efficacious.

Let the book speak for itself. We set down what we gather here and there without the interruption of comment, accepting the narrator of the fragments for the nonce as a veritable and veracious historian. Montalluyah is not only the chief city in the world in question, but its name extends to the entire planet, in which there is but one kingdom, governed by a Supreme Ruler, with the strange title "Tootmanyoso," and by twelve inferior kings. In religion, the people who inhabit it are rigidly monotheistic. In ancient times, it seems, the powers of nature were worshipped until a purer faith was introduced by a mythical sage named Elikoiah, who is only incidentally mentioned, but who was evidently the founder of such civilization as pertained to the inhabitants when the narrator of the fragments, raised to the rank of Tootmanyoso, began his work of reform.

According to mythological tradition, the chief antagonist of the venerable Elikoiah was the hippopotamus, who, in the early legends of Montalluyah, plays a part not altogether dissimilar to that of the serpent in the Mosaic record. However, it was afterwards discovered that this original foe to the mankind of the planet was capable of being utilized to an indefinite degree, and during the reign of the reforming Tootmanyoso it became one of the most valuable animals in the kingdom. The method of training the hippopotamus is described with as much minuteness as if the planetary speaker had an eye to the management of our Zoological Gardens. The reforms of the Tootmanyoso extended to every particular by which the moral or physical well-being of his people could be affected. Two principles mainly guided him. He settled within himself that in all cases of crime or disease, prevention is better than cure, and also that for certain occupations certain persons were exclusively fitted. In these principles there is of course nothing novel; but the minuteness with which the account of their application is given is really surprising. Nothing is too great, nothing too small, for the solicitude of the Tootmanyoso. Now he constructs gigantic works, compared with which the Egyptian pyramids are mole-hills; now he promotes the use of machines to prevent babies from hurting themselves by tumbling on their heads. No one can be more perfectly aware than the Tootmanyoso himself, of the narrow frontier between the sublime and the ridiculous; but he answers scoffers by remarking that incalculable evil results from the neglect of "little things." Indeed, the education of children, upon the principle that evil ought to be destroyed in the germ, is with him an object of especial care; his whole proceeding being founded on the conviction that it is better to extirpate faults of the child than to punish crimes in the man. He founded a college of "character-divers," who, by a natural gift, aided by a peculiar discipline, were able to penetrate into the dispositions of the young, and thus to eradicate faults, to develop good qualities, and to guide instructors as to the sort of training suitable to each individual case. He also established "amusement galleries," where, in the intervals of study, children were allowed to follow the bent of their own inclinations without restraint, thus facilitating the progress of the "character-divers" in their work of investigation.

The principle of putting the "right man" in the "right place" was pursued by the Tootmanyoso with a vigour which led to the minutest subdivision of labour. The profession of an oculist, for instance, extended, in his opinion, to far too large a subject for the exhaustive study of one man; and physicians were especially employed each in the care of some part of the eye, and so on in the various branches of medical science. One beneficial result of the minute subdivision of studies was an increased facility in the application of physical agencies, among which electricity holds a place so important, that it is scarcely too much to say that an electric fluid circulates through all the institutions of Montalluyah. Men of science in that favoured land have discovered that every kind of body or substance, whether animate or inanimate, contains an electricity of its own, and that these different electricities stand in the most varied relations to each other:—

"Some are diffused; some are concentrated; others are so tenacious of the body to which they belong that they are all but steadfast. Some are sympathetic; some antipathetic, attracting or repelling each other; some mingle gently; others, when brought into contact, cause violent explosions."

For what purposes these electricities—a large stock of which is preserved ready for use in a large "electric store-house"—may not be employed we cannot discover. By them bodies are lightened, the facilities of locomotion are increased, the germs of disease are eradicated, optical instruments are rendered more efficient, and musical instruments more delightful, flowers are made more beautiful, and photographic art is perfected, With such electricities as there are in Montalluyah, and with a Royal Society guided by such a Tootmanyoso, it is easy to believe that an antediluvian longevity is attained by nearly all the inhabitants, who at last die gently of old age. We can scarcely make out why they should die at all.

In illustration of one of the humblest uses to which electricity is applied, we give the statement of a "fact" and its result:—

"In my reign some interesting discoveries were made with regard to water. From a source situated in the midst of a lovely scene, flowed a spring of remarkably pure quality, some drops of which, taken at a distance, presented, when viewed through a microscope, a true picture of the landscape close to the source from whence they came. Rocks, trees, shrubs, sky, were there faithfully delineated with their varied forms and colours, together with the resemblances of two persons, lovers, seated on the banks. As we afterwards learned, they had been attracted by the beauty of the scene; had sat for a long time in the same place; and their portrait was, as it were, fixed on the water. The electricity of the sun and light had thrown the shadow or picture of the scene on the fluid, whose electricity had been sufficiently strong to retain it, and bear it to the spot whence the drops of water had been taken. This circumstance, and our knowledge that the reflecting power of the water is the result in part of its peculiar electricity, led to a very interesting discovery. With the assistance of a powerful attracting electric machine, we can produce, together with the surrounding landscape, the likeness of a person, or of a group, actually many miles from the machine, if near the water. The image is received on the reflecting mirror of the machine, and an artist immediately copies outlines and colours."

Even some of the spectacles presented in public for the amusement of the people are produced by electrical agency. The only art that does not greatly thrive is the dramatic. Innocent plays of a pastoral kind are indeed occasionally performed; but the tragic drama is extinct. Before the reign of the reformer there was probably a sort of Elizabethan era; and when he came to the throne plays based upon crime were commonly acted. But when, through the aid of "character-divers," electricity, &c., crime had fairly been driven beyond the boundary, tragedy became nearly unintelligible, the new generation being scarcely able to understand a plot relating to passions almost foreign to their nature.

So curious and so unconnected are the subjects set before us, that any selection we make must be by a somewhat haphazard process. Perhaps, as being a narrative complete in itself, and not resembling anything we have met in works of Oriental fiction, we shall not do wrong in giving the history of Allmanyuka. The people of Montalluyah, it seems, who are generally fond of good living, and have been encouraged, even by the reformer, in a taste for gorgeous costume, which is minutely described, were accustomed in the early part of the Tootmanyoso's reign to make liberal use of sauces seasoned with stimulating spice. An epidemic disease arose, and, by means of a microscope, (which was, of course, electrical,) was traced to the operation of unwholesome condiments. Not without misgivings, so generally was the taste for the spice diffused, did the Tootmanyoso forbid its use. The extreme heat of the climate rendered stimulants necessary, and there was no known fruit or vegetable that could have been used as a substitute for the prohibited kind. The injurious condiments were indeed secured in large warehouses, and placed under the charge of the inferior kings before mentioned; but the Tootmanyoso was aware that, unless some new stimulant was discovered, the serpent would have been scotched, not killed. He shut himself up in a little cabinet, at the summit of his palace, and passed some hours in meditation and prayer. At last a light burst upon him, and, having provided his people with a temporary cordial, he gathered a vegetable which bears the name Japperhanka and has a rich creamy taste, and grafted it on a tree called the Klook, the fruit of which has a sour aromatic flavour. By this combination he succeeded in growing a small vegetable uniting the flavour of cream with the piquancy of lemon, but lacking the stimulating qualities of the prohibited article. Into the seed of this new vegetable, therefore, in which an incision had been made, were inserted particles extracted from the seed of every spice-plant, and the care of the preparation was entrusted to the principal gardener; who, after a while, came to his master with the intelligence that a little bud was bursting forth in the urn in which the seed had been sown. In about three years fruit made its appearance, and the first specimen was brought in by the gardener, in a basket, beautiful even for Montalluyah, where basket-work is carried to perfection. On perceiving the contents of the basket the Tootmanyoso uttered "such a cry of joy as might escape a parent on finding a long-lost child." The first cooking of this precious product was not to be entrusted to the care of an ordinary chef. The Tootmanyoso, having ordered a small bird to be got ready, made, with his own hands, the sauce on which so much depended. The success was beyond expectation. So exquisitely appetizing was the condiment, that an epicure (the word is known in Montalluyah) might easily be tempted to eat the vegetable without the addition of the meat. Afterwards the fruit was extensively cultivated, declared wholesome by the new infallible doctors, and relished by all the people, who were loud in their manifestations of gratitude. As for the great inventor, he betook himself to the harp, and sang hymns of thanksgiving. The harp, it is to be observed, is in Montalluyah, the chief of all instruments, and a very magnificent instrument it is:—

"Around its framework most elegant and tasteful ornaments are executed with the minutest perfection—small birds of variegated plumage perched on graceful foliage of green enamel, with flowers in their natural colours, so executed as closely to resemble nature. The birds, flowers, and foliage are connected with the chords of the harp, and conceal from view small vases or reservoirs, set in the framework of the instrument. From these, with every touch of the chords, a beautiful fragrance is exhaled, the force or delicacy of which depends on the more powerful or gentler strains produced from the instrument.

"The instant the player strikes the chords, the light birds open their wings, the flowers quiver in gentle action, and then from the vases are thrown off jets of perfume. The more strongly the chords are touched, the more powerfully does the fragrance play around.

"In tender passages the perfume gradually dies away, till it becomes so faint as to be appreciated only by the most delicate organizations. The result, however, is, that the sense is gratified, the heart touched, and the whole soul is elevated."

As the Tootmanyoso generally speaks with an eye to our earth, shall we hazard a conjecture that in the description of the fruit-vegetable "Allmanyuka" he intends a parable for the edification of teetotalers, hinting that before they attempt utterly to banish alcohol, they had better invent some wholesome stimulant with which even the most ardent advocate of permissive licences would not presume to interfere?

When we conclude with stating that the chapters, forty-seven in number, describe (inter alia) a suspended mountain which threatened to tumble down and crush all Montalluyah, till the Tootmanyoso propped it up with a colossal mountain-supporter; the extensive use made of the microscope; the detection of incipient insanity; the rules observed in regulating the choice of a husband; the mafriage ceremony; the language of flowers, elaborated to a high degree of perfection; the means employed for the cultivation of babyhood; ships of swan-like form that are incapable of sinking, and the hippopotamus, we have said enough to show that this odd book possesses at least the charm of variety, and is likely to contain hints on a vast number of subjects of interest to mankind.

MR. CLAY'S MUSIC TO ORIANA.

Mr. Frederic Clay has a well-grounded right to respectful consideration whenever he chooses to put forward music of this class. Gifted with the rare power of discerning precisely where his strength lies, he has so cultivated the talent here illustrated that nothing from his pen can be without its interest, nor, judging by past achievement, without its merit. The music to Oriana is worthy of anything in Mr. Clay's previous career as a writer of music equivalent to the vers de société of another art. It is tuneful, expressive, and artistic, to a degree which lifts the composer quite out of the ranks of amateurs, and entitles him to professional honours. Who will say that the credit justly due to success in Mr. Clay's special department is not great? Music such as he excels in writing demands fancy and skill of no ordinary kind, and great advantage accrues to art when those who compose it are musicians as well as melodists. Mr. Clay's ability appears at once in the orchestral introduction to Oriana—an introduction as poetically suggestive as it is charmingly laid out for the instruments. Not less effective, in another way, is the air known as "The King's Air," and first heard in chorus to the words, "Royal Raymond, happy King." Broadly phrased and plainly harmonised, this piece is one of those triumphs of simplicity which are more difficult to achieve than successes of a pretentious order. Its theme, once heard, haunts the ear, and cannot be got rid of without effort. The spirit chorus, "Here, here, here," with its tripping six-eight rhythm and characteristic harp accompaniment, is another important feature; but even more popular will be the King's song, "Shepherd Prince, thy choice was right." This is written so much in Mr. Clay's best style and most graceful mood that its speedy publication in a separate form may be looked for. A second spirit chorus, "Above, below, and all around," excels the first in point of suggestiveness, and is also remarkable for a violin obbligato, con sordini, which runs its rapid course through the entire piece in the most delicate manner conceivable. The obliggato was a "happy thought" of Mr. Clay's, and is carried out so as to give exactly the "local colour" required. The music is made otherwise attractive by unaffected melody and unforced harmony. Less striking, perhaps, is the "Lullaby" chorus; but the music to Oriana's song, "The moon fell in love with a pea-green cat," shows a thorough appreciation of grotesque humour, and an ability to aid its expression, such as Mr. Clay has often manifested before, and such as he manifests again in "We are virgins, young and shy." We unhesitatingly place the last among the very best numbers in the work. Its seriousness is the essence of fun, and the essence of its seriousness is found in the cry, "Give us water," sung to a descending sequence of "sixths" with most dolorous effect. Passing over a flowing and tuneful duet for the King and Chloe, "But will you be always true," and the vigorous little chorus, thrice repeated, "Spirit of well," we come to the King's song, "Happy arm that shall be placed," an air, tempo di valse, with some effective points in the orchestration. This is followed by the second finale, "Call with trumpet, rouse with drum"—as martial and vigorous a strain as ever brought down the curtain upon succes. Its well-marked rhythmical theme and inspiriting treatment are exactly adapted to the situation. Chloe's song, "My love he has a fleecy form," with its characteristic oboe obliggato, is another success gained by the well-considered use of simple means. In this case, too, we notice the quiet humour which Mr. Clay can always throw into his music when occasion offers. One more number remains for notice. Finis coronat opus. It is the song, "I am weary of my life," sung by the King and answered by the chorus, "Oh! the world is well enough." For musicianly writing and truthful effect this is equal to anything Mr. Clay ever did—nay more, it is equal to the best things of its kind, be the author who he may. To sum up, we regard the music of Oriana as of more than common importance, not merely for its own sake, but for the influence exercised by every success of the kind. Having no English opera, it is to those works that we must look for the encouragement of dramatic composition; and every increase of the esteem in which they are held will tend, among other things, to ensure for them attention such as will not rest satisfied with an inefficient performance. Keeping this object in view, as well as the honour due to a success, we have noticed Mr. Clay's music in the detail it deserves.—Daily Telegraph.

HERR JOACHIM.

Herr Joseph Joachim made his first appearance for the present season, on Saturday afternoon, at the sixteenth Crystal Palace concert. The music-room was densely crowded in every part, and the welcome accorded to the greatest of living violinists was, as he had a full right to expect, in the highest degree enthusiastic. When he appeared on the platform, applause broke out from all sides. Scarcely a pair of hands seemed to be inactive in this hearty and tumultuous greeting. A bare record of the fact that Herr Joachim selected Mendelssohn's violin concerto for the occasion might suffice. But, often as he has played this admirable work in public, he has, perhaps, never before played it so superbly from beginning to end. Passing over the opening allegro molto, which was delivered with the fire and impassioned energy it demands, the andante, which charms no less by its simplicity than by its uninterrupted flow of melody—melody as "Orphean" as that of Mozart himself—was a model of pure, unaffected expression not to be surpassed; while the execution of the last movement ("allegro molto vivace"), the rapid pace at which it was taken borne in mind, was, to say nothing else, one of the most prodigious achievements of mechanical skill of which we have any recollection. Some earnest critics have maintained that this movement ought not to be taken at so great a speed; but it belongs essentially to the family of "scherzi," of which Mendelssohn was the inventor, and of which he left so many wonderful examples; and there are not a few, even in this country, who can remember—on Mendelssohn being asked how fast this scherzo, among others, should be taken—his curt and emphatic answer —"As fast as possible if only the notes are there." Her Joachim fulfils each bequest of the master, to whose counsel, when a very young man, he owed so much. He can execute the finale precisely in the way in which its composer conceived it, and that without a single note missed from the passages of most velocity, or a single mark of emphasis or of expression being overlooked. All, in short, is there. The applause was so loud and unanimous after each movement that Herr Joachim found some difficulty in complying with Mendelssohn's expressed desire, that one movement should flow into the other without stop—"without let or hindrance," as the elder writers on music would have phrased it. At the end of the performance there was another demonstration, no less hearty, spontaneous, and general than the first; and Herr Joachim retired from the platform with new and well-earned honours. It is only just to Mr. Manns and his excellent band of instrumentalists to say, that the accompaniments to Mendelssohn's concerto were never, in our remembrance, played in more absolute perfection.

In place of the Symphony at this concert we had the "Serenade" in D major, for full orchestra, by Herr Johannes Brahms, from whom, after the strong and marked eulogy of Robert Schumann, so much was expected; but who, nevertheless, although an earnest and indefatigable worker, has hardly done enough to justify Schumann's praises, or to win for himself a conspicuous artistic position away from the country of his birth. It is not because the works of Herr Brahms have remained in manuscript, like those genuine treasures of Franz Schubert, for an acquaintance with which we owe so much to the directors of the Crystal Palace and their indefatigable agents, Messrs. George Grove and A. Manns. A very considerable number of the most important of them are published, and, therefore, accessible to any amateur, connoisseur, or professional musician who is anxious to look into them for his own particular gratification. About a year since a pianoforte concerto, admirably played by Miss Baglehole, pupil of Mr. W. H. Holmes, and one of the most distinguished students of our Royal Academy of Music, was heard at the Crystal Palace. Mr. Arthur Chappell has brought forward at the Monday Popular Concerts a sextet in B flat for stringed instruments, and a quartet in A for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, neither of which can, in strict truth, be said to have produced a very lively impression. The Serenade in D was introduced at the Crystal Palace in the spring of 1868, and was given in St. James's Hall, at one of the concerts of the old Philharmonic Society, last summer. A new hearing affords no justifiable cause to change, or in any way to modify, our early opinion of this work. It is very lengthy, very pretentious, and very diffuse. Its diffuseness has not the excuse to which the diffuseness frequently characterizing Schubert's later compositions may fairly lay claim, inasmuch as Schubert's ideas are almost invariably original and striking; whereas, to judge at least by the Serenade in D major, the ideas of Herr Brahms possess little originality beyond their occasional treatment. That the Serenade exhibits constant evidence of the practised musicianship of its composer, and also shows a more than ordinary mastery of the orchestra, combined with fancy in the employment of orchestral resources, is undeniable; but the continual repetition of subjects, by no means intrinsically important, merely to exhibit them with new devices of instrumental ornament, becomes monotonous and wearisome. Every one of its movements must be pronounced unduly spun out, when the abstract interest of the materials upon which it is built is taken into consideration. Why the work should be called "Serenade" is difficult to explain. We had always imagined that a serenade should consist of gay and lively melodies, so as to keep awake the person in whose honour it is intended. But here we have a serenade which takes up little short of an hour in performance, one movement of which is more laborious and heavy than another. The "Waits," for evident reasons, would, under the circumstances, be preferable, whether "the beloved," or an eminent artist, or an illustrious warrior, were the object. In the last instance, it is probable that, like Cassio, the illustrious warrior would beg the serenaders to entertain his master with "something that's brief." But, seriously, the Serenade in D of the great and uncompromising Beethoven, so often heard at the Monday Popular Concerts, is made up exclusively of a succession of melodies as delightful as they are spontaneous. A more careful and uniformly admirable performance of Herr Brahms' elaborate work than that under the direction of Mr. Manns on Saturday could not have been desired, even by Herr Brahms himself. The wind instruments (largely and variously employed) were perfect, and the stringed instruments were worthy companions.

The overtures at this concert, one of the most generally attractive of the series, were Weber's sparkling and genial Abu Hassan and Auber's gorgeous and picturesque Masaniello, which, as an operatic prelude of its kind, yields only to the Guillaume Tell of Rossini. Both were played as the Crystal Palace orchestra invariably plays them. To say which is to say enough. The singers were Mdlle. Rizarelli, who has recently gained such honourable distinction at the Italian Opera in St. George's Hall, and our promising young tenor, Mr. Edward Lloyd. To the former were assigned airs from Mozart's Cosi fan tutte, and Bellini's Sonnambula, to the latter, 'Dalla sua pace' (Don Giovanni), and Mr. Frederick Clay's graceful song, "The shades of evening," instrumented by its composer for the occasion.

At the concert of to-day we are promised a new overture by Mr. Henry Gadsby, written expressly for these performances; some extracts from Wagner's operas; the overture to Rossini's Guillaume Tell and the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven.

RUY BLAS AT THE VICE-REGAL THEATRE.

This opera, destined to make the circuit of the world, after having several times made that of Italy, was performed on the 11th inst., before the habitués of the theatre and all the fine fleur of Cairo society. The principal parts were confided to Signore Parepa-Rosa, Corsi, Signori Carpi, Cattore, and Livi.

Signora Corsi and the three gentlemen had already sung this splendid music in various theatres of Italy. Signora Parepa-Rosa alone sustained her part for the first time, and her rendering of it was exactly what the composer, Marchetti himself, would have desired, looking at it both from a musical and an artistic point of view. The young and lovely Maria de Neubourg, Queen of Spain, weary of the cold and monotonous ceremonial of the Spanish Court, longing for tender affection, for gentle and delicate emotion, struggling between duty and love, but subsequently burning and transported with all the impetuosity of profound, fatal, and irresistible passion —such is the character Signora Parepa-Rosa had to pourtray upon the stage, and such was the character she represented with the most perfect accuracy of conception, and the brightest and most vivid colours. She was, in turns, ingenuous and enamoured, timid and moved by wild delirium, tranquil and agitated, queen and woman. Not a phrase did she neglect, not an accent did she miss. The ideal of the poet and of the composer was most happily and most completely realized by this magnificent artist. The public appreciated her merit, and overwhelmed her with continuous, unanimous, and tumultuous applause—with that applause, in a word, which alone constitutes a real success, and which is an artist's greatest and most highly cherished reward. The audience insisted on the famous love duet in the fourth act being repeated. In this truly stupendous piece, Signora Parepa-Rosa, excellently supported by the tenor, Carpi, rose fully to the height of the musical and dramatic situation, rendering it most effectively, and revealing all its sweetest and most hidden beauties. She was called on several times in the course of the opera; and, at the conclusion, the audience made her appear again, with Carpi, at least four times. Such enthusiasm is extremely rare here, and very seldom seen at the Vice-Regal Theatre.—Special correspondence of the "Omnibus."

PAULINE LUCCA IN BOSTON.

Mdme. Lucca's success in the Athens of the States was complete. Public and press, without a dissenting voice, voted her a great artist, and united to do her honour. We might fill a number of the Musical World with laudatory quotations from the Boston journals, but one or two will suffice—indeed, of any one it might be said, ex uno disce omnes. The following is taken from the Daily Evening Traveller :—

"Mdme. Lucca's long expected appearance in this city, was made last evening the occasion of one of the most brilliant and largest assemblages which ever graced the Boston Theatre. Mdme. Lucca's first appearance was a complete triumph, and one which was gained by the strongest dramatic and the most glorious vocal powers. Mdme. Lucca's noble ability was not at once recognized by the public here, but this recognition steadily increased from the moment of her entrance till the close of the opera. Her audience warmed from comparative apathy to the highest enthusiasm, still,' at the close of the opera, shouts after shouts of applause called the fair lady again and again before the curtain. Of Mdme. Lucca's voice we cannot express too much admiration, and one is led to inquire, with another writer, whence it can all come from so little a personage. Beautiful in quality, bright in its timbre, always true and unerring in the delivery of its tones, and strong to a marvellous degree, we can imagine nothing which could be supplied to make it better. Withal, its sympathetic qualities are marvellous, and it carries a fascination in it as marked as the fascination of the lady's beautiful eyes. One slight peculiarity of her delivery is especially lovely, and that is, the sibilant effects. So much, or rather so little, of what might be said of Mdme. Lucca's voice. Of her acting, what can be said which will do it justice? In the first acts it mainly lies in the facial expression, and the varied moods and passions which passed over her fair face were each perfect pictures. In action, each pose of her body is grace itself. But when the impassioned scenes of the last act are reached, the lady fills each moment with the most searching effects and the strongest realism. Her whole soul enters into the requirements of the scenes, and her every motion is a perfect interpretation of the feelings of the agonized and loving woman, whose errors are forgotten on account of her suffering. The aria, 'O, mio Fernando,' in Act III., was the first strong exhibition of her vocal powers, and the enthusiasm of the audience was but a faint mark of tribute to the glorious rendition."

The opinion of the Daily Advertiser was thus expressed :—

"Madame Lucca completely fills the part of Leonora, or rather, she more than fills it, far transcending by her own powers the commonplace creation of the composer. With the first swift entrance of the lithe and faultless little figure, and with the first notes of her recitative, the conviction of her complete mastery of the situation was carried home to every mind. In every movement and tone Madame Lucca is thoroughly dramatic, in the true sense of the word; the feeling of her character and of each phase of its changing emotions is brought home to the heart and the intelligence of the spectator by methods at once direct, just and impressive. Her performance is often filled to the brim with passion, but she never lacks the strength of self-control; and the line of artistic moderation, though sometimes exactly reached, is never passed. Her action is at once magnificent in its freedom and fascinating in its grace. In all the early scenes of the opera, Madame Lucca was strong and satisfying, and the pictures presented of the wretched Leonora, were highly impressive. The greatest effects were reserved for the last acts, however, and in these the gifts and skill of the great singer and the great actress were united with tremendous effect. The character of Madame Lucca's voice is pretty well known here by report. It is certainly a wonderful organ, of extraordinary brilliancy, power and resonance; its volume is immense; its sympathetic quality is undeniable; and above a few of its lowest notes it is even in purity and clearness. Madame Lucca manages her voice with the skill of a consummate vocalist, disdaining, however, the tricks which make up the stock-in-trade of so many florid singers. Her style of intonation, delivery, and phrasing may be pronounced nearly perfect. Madame Lucca's powers as a singer had no fair opportunity for exhibition until the 'O mio Fernando' of the third act, which was given with exquisite taste, with a brilliancy of tone and an intensity of feeling which called forth the enthusiasm of the audience. In the concluding act, however, and in a single scene, the genius of the dramatist and vocalist found their united culmination. Her terror and weakness upon entering the convent were touchingly pourtrayed; but, in the passages immediately following, Madame Lucca produced almost the greatest effect of her performance by the delivery of the two lines which express the agony of her discovery that Fernando is taking the vows of a monk; and when the words 'perduto al mondo' were uttered, the swift action of utter self-abandonment and despair with which she threw herself upon the earth was electric in its effect upon her auditors. During the final scene of the opera, it was impossible to imagine a more complete prostration of the soul in humble supplication, or a more vehement and passionate outburst of love and joy than that which accompanied her reconciliation with Fernando. Madame Lucca's acting here, indeed, only just stopped short of the 'something too much;' but it did stop short of the fatal mark, and it is to be remembered that the feeling of the moment is rather that of delirium than of health. Madame Lucca was rewarded with constant and enthusiastic applause, and was frequently encored; she was called before the curtain at the end of each of the first three acts, and twice at the close of the opera, the audience in the latter instances hailing her with cheers and shouts."

Dwight has also spoken, but Dwight must have a place to himself.

BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The third of Messrs. Harrisons' Chamber Concerts was in all respects equal to either of its predecessors. The artists, Madame Norman-Néruda, Mr. Charles Hallé, Messrs. Ries, Schreurs and Daubert, being the same, while the scheme included Beethoven's string quartet in C, Mozart's pianoforte sonata in D, No. 22, Spohr's duet in D minor for violins, and Mendelssohn's quartet in F minor for pianoforte and strings. Given such works with such players and the result will be readily understood. The vocal music comprised Dr. Hiller's prayer "Lord when my inmost soul," and a new song, "Mispah," by Burn, both sung by Miss Helen D'Alton—Mr. C. J. Stephens acting as accompanist, and both giving satisfaction to the audience.

Mr. Charles Russell, finding the attraction of symphonies and large orchestral works insufficient of themselves to fill the Town Hall even by one half, supplemented Mr. De Jong's band on the last occasion by a contingent of Mr. Mapleson's touring party—viz., Mdlle. Tietjens, Madame Sinico, Mdlle. Macvitz, Signori Campobello, Borella and Agnesi; and the result was that the vast room was crammed in every part, although the programme was absolutely devoid of novelty, being in the main a réchauffé of pieces which have for any number of years past been literally done to death in almost every concert-room in England. Under such circumstances I trust to be excused from entering into details which could hardly prove interesting. It would, however, be unfair to omit special mention of the new comer, Mdlle. Macvitz, described as a contralto, but whose voice is really a low mezzo-soprano of exceptionally fine quality, as was proved in Gluck's "Che faro senza Euridice," and Meyerbeer's "Nobil Signor" (transposed a tone higher). In addition to her good voice and agreeable presence, Mdlle. Macvitz displays an amount of intelligence and feeling in her singing which warrants hope that, with further study of her art, a high position may be attained by the promising young Russian lady.

Mr. F. H. Cowen's performance of Mendelssohn's Rondo Brillante in E flat was distinguished by neatness and care, a compliment which can scarcely with truth be awarded to the orchestral accompaniment. In classical compositions, such as Mozart's overture to Il Flauto Magico, Mendelssohn's overture to Ruy Blas, and the concerto just named, the substitution of cornets for trumpets is a manifest drawback to Mr. De Jong's band taking the high position at which it aims. ## AN ARTIST'S TRAVELS.

Signor Piatti, the renowned violoncellist, undertook his first professional tour in England with Molique. They were both in high spirits the first day, and in the evening occupied adjoining rooms in their hotel. Piatti was already sliding into the arms of Morpheus, when he was aroused by a continuous pat—pat—pat. It was his neighbour, and not Don Juan's Stone Guest come to supper. Molique was having his regular smoke. In vain did Piatti appeal to him. "Sooner than give up my pipe, I would die," said Molique, "and when I smoke, I must move about." The tap—tap—tap re-commenced, the floor again creaked, and all chance of the unhappy violoncellist's sleeping was at an end.

Piatti undertook his second tour in company with M. Sainton. There was nothing to fear from this gentleman on the score of smoking, but he had a different passion: he was an inveterate domino-player. If ever he could catch hold of any one to play with him, he would not let him go again so easily. Piatti might have slept soundly enough while Sainton and his victim were waging war against each other, had not the end of each game been accompanied by the blow of a fist upon the table, with the words: "Confound that double six! I always get it!" or some other exclamation, according to circumstances. Poor Piatti felt as if he himself were the cause of this run of ill-luck, and sleep was out of the question.

His third trip was undertaken in conjunction with Ernst. The anxious violoncellist, previous to starting, had managed to find out that Ernst, unlike his predecessors, neither smoked nor played dominoes. In the evening, the two put up at a small inn, in a small town. There was only one room vacant, and that contained only a single bed. The artists were obliged to share it between them. Ernst dropped off first; sure of his sleep, Piatti followed. The clock of the parish church had just announced midnight, when Piatti was startled out of his slumbers by a threatening and terrible voice near him, crying out: "Wretch! Villain! Die!" Almost frightened to death, Piatti hid his head under the bedclothes. A confused medley of curses, oaths, lamentations, and moaning followed, till at last, the tone became milder. "What?—very well, then—I forgive you!" Piatti now gained courage to sit up. His neighbour lay quietly by his side, just awoke from a fearful nightmare. The same scene was renewed every night. Piatti was in despair.

Years passed by, until at length the artist thus diabolically deprived of his rest, undertook another tour, this time with Sivori. There was every prospect of uninterrupted repose. The two artists were separated, one being on one story and the other on another. Piatti stretched his legs out contentedly, and had just extinguished the light, when he heard very distinctly a nibbling and scraping. "Mice!" he exclaimed with horror, leaping out of bed. "Pst! Pst!" he began. He listened, but the noise still continued. Unable to contain himself, he pulled violently at the bell-rope. The porter appeared. "You have mice in the place!" thundered forth the artist. "Mice! No, Sir, we never had such things!" replied the man. "Then it's rats." —"I never saw a single rat, Sir."—"I don't suppose you have mosquitoes?"—The porter did not know, but he said he would go and call the waiter. He informed the latter that the gentleman in No. 6 wanted a dish he knew nothing about—mosquitoes. The waiter had the reputation of the house at heart. Entering Piatti's room, he said: "You would like some mosquitoes, I am informed, Sir; I'm very sorry, Sir —we have none at present, but we shall have some next week." "Next week! What, have you really none now?"—"I regret exceedingly," began the waiter, in a stammering voice. "But what is that noise?" asked Piatti. The waiter looked at him in astonishment, and then they both listened. The waiter, recovering his composure, observed: "That is probably the gentleman in No. 7, practising on his instrument." Such was the case. It was Sivori, in night costume and without a light, working the bow over the loose strings; this was his way of practising at night. "I tell you what, Sivori," said his travelling-companion, totally crushed; "I have been in Spain, where the Serenos proclaim every hour of the night; I have been in Holland, where people are paid for waking the sleeper with a clapper; and I have slept at Antwerp, where the bells play every hour variations on the 'Carnaval,' and every half-hour the song of the Tambour Major from Le Caïd; as you perceive, I am seasoned for sleeping under all circumstances. But, if there is anything which I cannot get over, anything capable of depriving me of sleep, it is mice or mosquitoes; any noise like that of these creatures jars upon my nerves. Therefore, in the name of friendship, give up such imitations on your violin, or, if not, we must part."

And they did part! Piatti was next engaged to travel with Hermann. Before things, however, came so far, he subjected him to a serious examination, as to whether he smoked, indulged in dominoes, played on the violin at night, or had any tendency to somnambulism. All these questions were answered with a decided: "No." Suddenly a thought flashed through Piatti's brain. "Have you supped?" he enquired of his new travelling companion, the first evening. "No; I shall be very glad, however, to do so in your society." Ever since suffering from sleepless nights, Piatti was accustomed to take, before going to bed, a cup of tea, in which he dissolved a small pill, a harmless soporific for sleepless martyrs. The two artists, after supping and taking tea, slept admirably. In the morning, Piatti had some trouble to wake his companion. "Have you slept well?" he enquired of him. "Like a top," was the answer. "Shall we sup together again this evening?" enquired Piatti. "I should like nothing better," answered Hermann. The second night, they both slept even better than they had slept the first. "Good Heavens!" remarked Hermann; "how soundly one sleeps in this country!" "It is the humid fogs," said Piatti. "It strikes me frequently that I sleep an unnaturally long time," observed Herrmann, after the sixth night. "Nonsense," replied Piatti; "one can never sleep enough. Just read what Shakespeare says about sleep."

When a new fellow-traveller arose in the person of Henri Wieniawski, to whom we owe these facts, Piatti involuntarily knitted his brows. "What is the matter?" Wieniawski enquired. "Nothing! only certain disagreeable reminiscences," and, thereupon, he narrated his sufferings. "Do not be alarmed," said Wieniawski, re-assuringly. "I smoke only after dinner; I play at dominoes only while I am smoking; and I dream without making a noise." Piatti breathed freely. An arrangement was easily concluded, by which Wieniawski engaged to do all in his power not to disturb Piatti's rest; while Piatti, on his part, bound himself not to put any "little pill" in Wieniawski's tea, or in anything else he drank.

Each conscientiously kept his promise, and, at the end of the journey, they were in a position to assure each other that the tour had been one of the pleasantest they had ever made.—Die Signale.

REVIEWS.

BOOSEY & Co.

Mdme. Sainton Dolby's Tutor for English Singers.

An artist who has attained to eminence, makes good a double claim upon public consideration when he lays before the world the secret of his art, and points out the way by which others can follow in his steps. Such teaching has a special value, and, therefore, all lovers of music will welcome the volume in which Mdme. Sainton-Dolby gives the result of her long experience as one of the most renowned of English singers and most successful of teachers. No work could be offered more gracefully to the public whom Mdme. Sainton delighted for so many years with her pure and perfect art. "English by birth," she writes in her introduction, "English by education, English at heart, I have long desired to offer to young pupils the fruits of my long experience in a career to which I owe my happiest remembrances. In trying to smooth the difficulties in the path of such students, I only pay a debt of gratitude to my compatriots who encouraged my first steps and applauded my subsequent efforts, and of which I am, and ever shall feel proud." We are sure that Mdme. Sainton's book will be received in the spirit with which it is offered, and that recollections of its author's successful career will encourage those who follow its wise counsels. Mdme. Sainton limits the scope of her work to ladies voices, and to those branches of the vocal art which are essentially English, as, for example, oratorio and ballad singing. On these things she can speak with an authority surpassed by none, while she takes care, at the outset, to demonstrate that her own long mastership of them has not lessened her sense of their difficulty. The manual is divided into three parts, the first of which discusses the elements of vocalization in a clear and succinct fashion, the remarks being accompanied by copious examples and a course of well-graduated lessons with pianoforte accompaniment. In this portion of her work Madame Sainton is careful to guard against the idea that any printed instruction can entirely supersede the necessity for the teaching of a professor. She points out exactly where and in what respect the professor's guidance is necessary, and by so doing adds much to the value of a work primarily intended for self-help. The second section is devoted to hints on expression, style, taste, and generally those higher qualities which make the artist as distinguished from the mere vocalist. With equal point and brevity are these matters discussed, and afterwards illustrated by an unique series of exercises from the pen of the author, and of PANSERON Crescentini, and Bordogni. Apart from the teaching value of these compositions, they have a value as music which cannot fail to augment the interest taken in them by the pupil. The third part will secure for Madame Sainton's book a welcome where there is no intention of studying its contents seriously and in order. How many earnest amateurs have longed for hints from such an artist as Madame Sainton with regard to the best known classical songs? Here that longing is fully gratified; songs and hints have been given together in such a manner that nothing is left to desire. Among the selections are "Pious orgies," "With verdure clad," "Softly sighs," "John Anderson," "Should he upbraid," and many others of equal merit and popularity. This bouquet of melodies worthily ends a book in right of which Madame Sainton has a claim upon the gratitude of all who value the spread of true musical knowledge and skill.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1873.

THOSE who are in the habit of observing the signs of the times cannot fail to have noticed the decided advance lately made by music of what may be called the modern school, as distinct from that of the accepted great masters. Nothing is clearer than that, for good or for evil, the exclusive reign of those masters is over. Time was—a little while ago—when the production of a work not belonging to the orthodox school involved the necessity of apologising for undue boldness, or the setting up of a plea that curiosities are always interesting, even though ridiculous. But we have changed all that. The most eccentric effusions of the modern school are brought out by concert-givers with the air of men who do the art a service; and the programmes of our most orthodox societies are occupied, as of right, by composers not long since either unknown, or looked upon as musical fungi, quick to spring up, and quick to disappear. We do not refer to the Crystal Palace, because there new men and new works—of late, even English men and works—have always met with a welcome and a hearing. But even at the Crystal Palace increasing boldness marks the action of the innovators. "G." discovers more and more beauties in the "ideality" of modern composers; and, taught by him, a public is growing into the belief that the race of great musicians did not end for the remainder of the century in 1847. All this, however, was to be expected; but what shall be said to the actual and active existence among us of a Wagner Society, bent upon turning English taste from the error of its way, and converting us all into disciples of the Prophet Richard? What shall be said, moreover, when our venerable Philharmonic Society, the conservator, in right of its traditions, of all that is classical and orthodox, admits Wagner, Liszt, Brahms, et hoc genus omne, to the full honour of its programmes? The Philharmonic scheme for 1873 lies before us, and in it we find Liszt's "poeme symphonique," Tasso; Brahms' Requiem; the overture to Wagner's Der Fliegende Holländer; and the overture to Berlioz's Carnival Romain. After this, all who have fought against the invasion of modern music may lay down their arms. The citadel of defence has capitulated. But, has anybody so fought? Whatever the fact, a great many people are believed to have done so, and each advance of the invader is looked upon in the light of a triumph over individuals. As far as our knowledge goes, all this is based upon delusion, and takes its rise in an excessive sensitiveness, due to the excessive enthusiasm of the "new school," and its scholars. We do not believe that anybody demurs to the fair trial of new works—not even to the Wagnerian theory in its fullest development. There may be persons who would rather devote time and attention to matters more likely, in their estimation, to yield good results; but that is quite a different thing from such an objection to modern novelties as would keep them hidden from public view. Moreover, hostility so carried out would imply a sense of weakness which those are not at all likely to feel who take their stand upon the orthodox canons of art. Rather would we, because of the very strength of our position, help to place the productions of modern musical thought in the fierce light of publicity, that all their strength and all their weakness may be fully seen. Let no one imagine, therefore, that the advance of the new school of music is a triumph over opposition. The teachers of that school may come in all the strength of their numbers and their ardour. The way is open, and they shall have a hearing quite as attentive as that given to St. Paul on Mars' Hill, even though they tell us of a god whom, now, we "ignorantly worship."

Why is it necessary to say all this?—Simply because the excessive sensitiveness already referred to cannot distinguish between condemnation of a new thing because it is bad, and hatred of it because it is new. A class of persons exists among us whose favourite craze is the inherent progressiveness of art. They believe—happy souls—that art moves on in obedience to a grand law of development, and that all its changes are necessarily an approach to ultimate perfection.

We will not argue this matter now—contenting ourselves by asking en passant, what progress the art of sculpture has made since the Apollo Belvedere and the Venus de Medici were chiselled. But it is easy to see how the existence of such a belief identifies the new with the good, and makes worth synonymous with novelty. Persons afflicted with this idea easily confound disapproval of a new thing with disapproval of its newness, and so create an entirely false issue. We are anxious that a delusion so absurd in its consequences should at once cease, and determine that the partisans of modern musical thought may see in objections to their favourite works only conscientious disapproval of the theories upon which they are based. One result of this will be the limitation of victory and defeat to the real matters in dispute. Te Deums sung over the frequent performances of music belonging to the modern school are rejoicings over triumphs gained in a battle with shadows. They should be sung only when Wagner and Liszt are called to a higher place in the musical Pantheon than Mozart and Beethoven.

GEMMY BRANDUS.

(From the "Gazette Musicale," Feb. 16.)

The Revue et Gazette Musicale is again cruelly bereaved. Gemmy Brandus is no more.

A death unexpected—nearly sudden—took from us, on Wednesday last, in the prime of his life and powers, our excellent and dear director. The too short period during which this journal received his wise and loyal guidance—he follows to the tomb, at an interval of six months, his regretted predecessor, S. Dufour—was more than sufficient to allow those that remain, and who will continue their task in the same unity and spirit, to feel profoundly the loss they have sustained.

To strict honesty, to perfect tact, to the artistic feeling so necessary to the head of a great publishing house, Gemmy Brandus united the most precious qualities of the heart. His friendship was sure; and his dealings with all who approached him bore the stamp of goodness and true kindness. He knew not an enemy; and himself was the enemy of none.

Gemmy Brandus was born Jan. 3, 1823, and had, therefore, just completed his fiftieth year. He had shared, since 1846, with his elder brother, M. Louis Brandus, the direction of the firm established by Maurice Schlesinger, which M. S. Dufour joined later. M. Louis Brandus is now left alone to discharge a heavy task till the young son of his well-loved brother grows old enough to take a part.

The obsequies of Gemmy Brandus took place on Friday, and were attended by an immense crowd of friends, artists, and confrères. Many tears were shed around his grave.

NATIONAL MUSIC MEETINGS.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—From letters I have lately received, there appears to be some uncertainty as to the interpretation of Rule IX. Pray allow me to explain that competitors entering the Classes for large Choral Bodies are not prevented by the Rule referred to from subdividing and competing in Classes for smaller numbers.

Rule XXIV. must be observed, and the Form of Application be distinct and separate in each case.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

Florence.—Signor and Signora Tiberini have joined the company at the Pergola. Signor Tiberini has sung with great success in Un Ballo in Maschera. Signora Tiberini will appear ere long; in Dinorah, some say; in Prince Poniatowski's Gelmina, say others.

Milan.—The new grand ballet, Le Due Gemelle, by Signor Pallerini, with music by Signor Ponchielli, has made a hit at the Scala.—Signor Achille Sfondrini has prepared the plans for a day-theatre, capable of containing 3000 persons, and to be constructed on the bastion of the Porta Ticinese.

St. Louis, Mo.—"As appropriate to the occasion, the forthcoming 17th of March, we intend"—writes a correspondent—"to produce Professor Glover's cantata, St. Patrick at Tara, which has come to us from London with very high recommendation."

MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD'S FAREWELL.

(From the "Pall Mall Gazette.")

The announcement of a "farewell concert" by Madame Arabella Goddard must have taken almost every one by surprise; the most surprising thing being that the "farewell" applies not for a season, and to London only, but to England, and for ever. We can remember no other instance of an artist voluntarily abandoning a brilliant career at its most brilliant point. A player who is beginning to lose nerve, a singer who is beginning to lose voice, may gracefully retire before the signs of decay become too evident; but Madame Goddard, both as regards years and talent, is absolutely in her prime. She was born, we learn from a memoir published by a contemporary, in 1836; and she perhaps never played so well, and certainly never better, than on the occasion of her "farewell." It is said to be Madame Goddard's intention to travel round the world—to Australia, California, and Canada, among other fortunate countries; and, in spite of the Horatian line on the subject of sea-voyages, we may hope that, in crossing the ocean, she will change not only her "sky," but also, and above all, her "mind;" so that, returning to England, she may recommence a career which, from our point of view, ought not to have been interrupted. Making her début at a very early age, Madame Goddard has now been some twenty years before the English public, while nearer thirty than twenty years have elapsed since she first performed in presence of an audience. It was in Paris, as a child of six, that Madame Goddard first exhibited her talent as a pianist. A year or two later she passed under the tuition of Kalkbrenner, one of the most famous pianists, and probably the very first master of his time. From Kalkbrenner Miss Goddard acquired at least the foundation of that perfect mechanism, without which such qualities as delicacy of touch and subtlety of expression—qualities by which Miss Goddard's playing was always distinguished, and which, in their essence, are gifts—would have gone for nothing, or rather could not, in any adequate development, have existed. Afterwards, in a very different style, she received a certain number of lessons from Thalberg, who, according to Heine, was the most "gentlemanly" of the great pianists, and who, like his fair pupil when she took to playing Thalbergian fantasias on her own account, executed the most astounding passages with all possible calmness, and the most tender passages without once losing his reserve. We do not suppose Miss Goddard's playing ever reminded any one of the scientific, methodical Kalkbrenner; but many, when Thalberg visited England some ten years ago, noticed an expressiveness in his firm, sensitive, elastic touch which suggested the effect his lessons, few though they were, may nevertheless have had upon a student prepared by a congenial disposition to adopt something of his manner. Thalberg was a pianist who could have gained distinction in any style. It was, perhaps, in what he himself called "the art of singing applied to the piano" that he chiefly excelled. Yet, speaking generally, the music he cultivated was that of display—the music which serves to exhibit the talent of the musician, rather than that of which the musician, if he does his duty, should seek to exhibit the beauty. Miss Goddard learned to play Thalberg's brilliant fantasias very brilliantly; but Thalberg was the first to see, and to point out to her, that if she wished to attain the highest position as a pianist in England, she must devote herself to classical music, for which he had already observed that she possessed all the requisite sympathy and capacity. This the greatest composer of the fantasia school recommended her to study under Mr. J. W. Davison, to whom Madame Arabella Goddard may be supposed to owe much of the knowledge and mastery she is known to possess of the great pianoforte composers of the classical school.

It is scarcely necessary to narrate the history of Madame Goddard's chief appearances in public. She has played, in her time, at promenade concerts, at miscellaneous concerts, at ballad concerts, at series of "Recitals," given by herself and of her own devising, at the Philharmonic and New Philharmonic concerts, at the concerts of the Crystal Palace, and, more often, perhaps, than anywhere else, at the Monday Popular Concerts. With the "Monday Populars" her name and memory will always be associated; and it was appropriate that, in taking leave of the English public, she should do so in a concert of the "Monday Popular" pattern.

That on this occasion St. James's Hall was crowded; that the audience included an unusually large number of musicians and well-known amateurs; and that Madame Arabella Goddard, when she appeared on the platform, was received with the warmest demonstrations of good-will, is what every one will believe without laying any particular stress on the facts. The Sonata of the evening was Woelfl's "Ne Plus Ultra." Such interest as it possesses is chiefly historical; and though it may have been worth while to show that Woelfl in the piece in question had anticipated modern composers in almost every form of the "variation," most certainly in all the forms best known, we have always thought that Woelfl's "Ne Plus Ultra" Sonata has been admired at the Monday Popular Concerts a little on account of the composer's variations, and a great deal on account of the pianist's mode of playing them. Still there was a sort of reason why Madame Goddard, in taking leave of her numerous friends and admirers, should perform Woelfl's variations on "Life let us cherish," rather than some sonata, less curious but more beautiful, by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, or Schubert. Woelfl was a classical composer, who, in the work in question, wrote by exception, and, so to say, by condescension, in the fantasia style. Indeed, both styles are employed in this very sonata, which, for that reason, may have been looked upon as a suitable piece for the exhibition of the two-fold talent of the admirable artist who is leaving us. The audience were satisfied, and more than satisfied; for, on the conclusion of the sonata, Madame Goddard was twice recalled, and not allowed to retire without again sitting down to the piano, when she played, with charming expression, Thalberg's "Home, sweet home."

There is no composer in whose music Madame Goddard is heard to more advantage than in that of Mendelssohn, and of this she reminded us by her performance of the principal part of Mendelssohn's Sonata in D, for piano and violoncello (the violoncello part played in perfection by Signor Piatti). Madame Goddard also played the accompaniment of Beethoven's "Adelaida," which she has so often played at the Monday Popular Concerts for Mr. Sims Reeves, who, being indisposed, was efficiently replaced on this occasion by Mr. Edward Lloyd. But her last solo performance was in the symbolical "Home, sweet home," where, after one or more voyages round the globe, we may hope that an artist England cannot afford to lose—one of the very few really distinguished artists that England has ever produced—will feel disposed to return.

(From the "Graphic.")

Madame Arabella Goddard, after occupying a high position in art for twenty years, bade farewell to the English public on Tuesday evening week in St. James's Hall. The distinguished pianist is still young, and her ability is at its height, but reasons which are withheld from the public have induced her to resolve upon a final artistic tour round the world, and then retirement altogether from public life. We can only join in the universal expressions of regret that this should be the case. It is bad enough to lose any artist of distinction, but there are circumstances connected with Madame Goddard which intensify the misfortune. She alone has, for many years, upheld the honour of English art in the front ranks of the world's great pianists; and to her we have been accustomed to look for a constant supply of novelties, such as no other artist would take the trouble to give us. With regard to this matter, let us say that a complete list of the masterpieces first introduced to an English audience by Madame Goddard would excite astonishment, and be the best vindication of her claim to grateful recollection. No wonder at the regret with which connoisseurs look upon her retirement from the position she has so long adorned. Her withdrawal leaves a huge gap not easily filled, and cuts off one fertile source of musical interest and instruction. A crowded audience attended the farewell concert, which was, in character, precisely like the "Monday Populars," so closely associated with Madame Goddard's name. It can hardly be necessary to describe the reception given to the bénéficiaire, or the enthusiasm with which her wonderfully fine performance of Woelfl's "Ne Plus Ultra" Sonata was received. Madame Goddard never played more brilliantly in her life than on this final occasion; and two recalls, followed by a peremptory encore, testified to the delight she had given her audience. She also joined Signor Piatti in Mendelssohn's fine Sonata in D major (Op. 58), and, with the same gentleman and Mr. Carrodus, played Haydn's Trio in G major. Mr. Santley and Mr. Lloyd were the vocalists.

(From the "Choir.")

Foremost among the musical events of the past fortnight must be placed the farewell concert of Mdme. Arabella Goddard, given at St. James's Hall, on Tuesday evening week, before an audience which, in point of numbers, could scarcely have been increased, while, as regards its evident desire to do honour to the great artist, it could not have been more demonstrative. And we are not surprised at either result. Mdme. Goddard has long been the favourite pianist in our concert-rooms, the devoted exponent of the classical and legitimate, as distinguished from the frivolous and meaningless, effusions which some other performers are not ashamed to play, so that musicians, whether actually members of the craft or mere lovers of the art, could scarcely fail to assemble en masse to do her honour. If we had the space to allude to the various stages in her career, which—note it, ye who believe that devotion to high art does not bring financial success—has been one long series of triumphs, we could point to many instances in which she has conquered difficulties before considered insuperable, and has given a hearing to works never till then attempted. Beethoven and Mozart, Haydn and Handel, Mendelssohn and Schubert, are alike indebted to her for unveiling to the world the choicest beauties of their works; and if spiritualism is, after all, anything but a fancy, who can doubt that they, too, joined in the homage which was so worthily offered to her on Tuesday. Nor did she stop short with the great masters. Taking down from the shelf the scores of Dussek, Clementi, Woelfl, and others, less only in comparison with the almost superhuman greatness of the dii majores, she has given us, at those Popular Concerts, where her name will ever be enshrined as a household word, sonata after sonata, many of which would, without her intervention, have remained unknown, while in less skilful hands they would have been misunderstood. To Mdme. Goddard, then, belongs the honour—and it is the highest honour which an artist can attain—of never having forgotten the dignity of art, of never having truckled to the musical financier, whose sole object is money, not music; of never having played a piece of worthless writing either to please a publisher, a composer, or an audience. In these days such consistency is rare, and, being rare, it is the more admirable. Nay, but some reader may say, Mdme. Goddard found there was no need to descend from her high platform, and simply played the best because she found that the public came willingly to listen to it. To such an argument, if indeed it is worthy of the name, the answer is obvious. No one who knows the temper of the British public and the character of our miscellaneous audiences can doubt that although the good and true in this case prevailed against the false and meretricious, it has been largely owing to the devotion of the artist whose physical labour must have been extraordinary in order to produce in succession works of great difficulty, which had hitherto found no place in the pianist's répertoire. On all grounds, then, the public and the inner circle of musicians had good cause to assemble, as they did in full force, to say farewell to such a true artist. A "last farewell" we would fain hope it is not to be, for unless we are much mistaken, the place which Mdme. Goddard will leave in our midst will remain vacant until she returns once more to fill it. When a great performer parts from us, owing to age or failing voice, we are obliged, even though with great regret, to admit the justice of their choice; but when, as in the present case, an artist in the prime of life, and in the full possession of the true music-making powers which nature too rarely bestows, takes her leave, we may fairly ask for a re-consideration of her decision; and in this case, at any rate, we are convinced that the demand for many repetitions of the performances we have all listened to with delight will greet Mdme. Goddard on her return to England. Meanwhile may the good ship carry its freight safely to the other side of the globe, and may a welcome as hearty as our own farewell greet the artist of whom, before all others, Englishmen have cause to feel proud.

(From the "Court Circular.")

Madame Goddard is lost to us for ever! Those who would again hear her play in public should follow the example of Sir John Herschel and other astronomers, who, in 1858, pursued the tract of Donati's comet across the equator to southern latitudes, that they might continue to watch its movements. They must proceed in the train of the fair pianiste to Australia, and thence to the United States. Madame Goddard, after a tour in these transmarine regions, will retire into private life, and (we believe) devote herself entirely to tuition—no mean service, by the way, to art.

We will postpone, for the present, a formal review of this great artist's triumphant career of twenty years. A classical pianist, par excellence, she has gone the round of the great composers. What more can be said of a performer who, still a girl in her teens, was the first to grapple with, and in one sense subdue, Beethoven's Goliath Sonata in B flat, hitherto unattempted (before the public) even in Germany, and frightful to the eye of ordinary people for its extraordinary difficulties. Madame Goddard's mechanism is simply perfect; and to the small detractors who hint their hesitating dislike of her style, on account of its "coldness" or want of "soul," we can only reply with a prayer for the perpetual presence of Arabella Goddard's mind, and the simultaneous absence of our critical friends in the flesh—not that our enthusiasm would be frozen by contact with such icicles, but that cold is trying to the temper. Apart from her wonderful skill as an executant, we hold Madame Goddard's greatest merit to have been—as we have so often repeated—her absolute self-annihilation in the reading of the chosen text. Some self-conceited clergymen show themselves off even whilst delivering the lessons of Scripture. Madame Goddard's thoughts were of Beethoven alone—and her supposed coldness was the stern suppression of subjectivity—as a judge, animated with all the feelings of a man, refuses to indulge in luxurious and demonstrated emotion that he may evolve the great truths of the law, and serve the course of justice on strict and honourable principles.

Madame Goddard, on Tuesday evening week, the night of her farewell concert, attracted the whole town and most of the musical world. She played (by desire) Woelfl's "Ne Plus Ultra" Sonata; and, thrice recalled, resumed her seat at the pianoforte, choosing, for "voluntary," her favourite fantasia of Thalberg, on "Home, sweet home." The concerted pieces in which Madame Goddard took part were Mendelssohn's delightful Sonata in D, for pianoforte and violoncello (Signor Piatti); and Haydn's Pianoforte Trio in G.

Sir Julius Benedict conducted the concert, at the end of which a most affecting demonstration took place. Madame Arabella Goddard abdicates her throne in the maturity of her powers and the full bloom of her genius; but very much in opposition to the will of her subjects, and under very different circumstances from the unfortunate King of Spain.

(From "The Conservative.")

The "farewell" which Madame Arabella Goddard took of the English public on Tuesday evening week has cast a gloom over the musical horizon, which, although anticipated, is none the less painfully appreciated. In the fulness of her powers, still young in years, with mental and physical energy ripened by experience and exercise, our Queen of Pianists has abdicated her throne, bid adieu to her musical supporters, and expressed her intention, after a brief visit to the New World, to retire into private life. To the Philharmonics—Old and New—to the Crystal Palace, and Monday Popular Concerts, and to every society in which high musical art is cultivated, such a retirement promises a loss, and suggests a blank, which it would be presumptuous to believe the present generation can see filled up. The very fact of our fair countrywoman having distanced all rivalry will, moreover, render any attempt to instal another in her place a task as difficult as it must be ungrateful. The concert given on Tuesday evening was after the pattern of those Madame Goddard has been mainly instrumental in establishing, and was sustained by her in a manner which has rendered her name "a household word" in connection with the pianoforte throughout the length and breadth of the land. Associated with her on the occasion was her faithful ally, Signor Piatti, besides other instrumentalists well known to the Monday Popular audiences. Woelfl's "Ne Plus Ultra" Sonata, Mendelssohn's Duo (Op. 58), and Haydn's Trio in G, were the principal works in the programme. The "Ne Plus Ultra" Sonata was judiciously chosen, for it suggested the position to which Madame Goddard has arrived by the exercise of her talents in a career extending over more than twenty years. The Sonata, moreover, contains an air which is associated with words which were not without import on such an occasion. "Thy name we will cherish" appeared to be a variation in the mouths of the numerous audience which listened with wrapt attention to the great pianist's final cadences, but was succeeded by that hearty applause which such fine playing never fails to evoke. At the conclusion of the concert one word, "farewell," was uttered; and that expressed the esteem, the respect, and the admiration, of every true lover of the musical art, as also those sentiments which the severance of long-cherished ties elicits. Such a "leave-taking" was alike honourable to our countrywoman and to the English public.

(From the "Musical Standard.")

We can only, this week, briefly chronicle the last concert of Mdme. Arabella Goddard, and record its triumphant success. Mdme. Goddard chose for her solo, by particular desire, Woelfl's "Plus Ultra" Sonata in F, which she played, as usual, to perfection, and with a consummate finish in the variations on the air, "Life let us cherish," that, to use hyperbolical language, almost surpassed even our own sanguine expectations. Two recalls ensued, and at length the fair lady, who looked remarkably well, wearing a most elegant dress of yellow silk and bearing a large bouquet, was induced to return to the pianoforte. Her second ("voluntary") piece was Thalberg's showy and pretentious version of "Home, sweet home," rather a favourite of Mdme. Goddard's, but, musically, a mere nothing. Mdme. Goddard afterwards joined Signor Piatti in Mendelssohn's delicious Sonata, for pianoforte and violin, in D major, Op. 58, and at the end of the concert played Haydn's Trio in G major, containing the Hungarian Rondo, in conjunction with MM. Carrodus and Piatti. We noticed a host of "notabilities" in the hall, which was crowded to the doors.

The Orchestra reproduces the article which appeared in the Times the day after the concert.

OCCASIONAL NOTE.

"'Rosalie' is a term applied by French and Italian composers to designate a worn-out, used-up vocal phrase. The usual German expression, as the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung informs us, is 'Schusterflecke.' The term, which is a very old one, owes its origin to the following occurrence. An Italian composer, not too liberally supplied with genius, was once commissioned to set a mass to music for the Festival of St. Rosalie. His work, when sent in, was found to be filled with thread-bare, worn-out phrases. Italian musicians are naturally of a merry disposition, and fond of a joke. The members of the band soon began ridiculing the striking absence of ideas in the mass. One of them suggested that, whenever they met an old acquaintance, politeness required them to bow, and that when they came across a particular phrase, repeated more frequently than any other, they should make a more than ordinarily deep and respectful obeisance. The joke ran in a moment from one end of the orchestra to the other, and whenever the famous passage recurred all the musicians made a profound bow. The audience soon remarked this strange pantomine, and some laughed; this caused a slight disturbance to the grand indignation of the pious, and to the no small bewilderment of the poor composer. Since that time, the term 'Rosalie' has borne the additional signification given above."

["Rosalie" means nothing of the kind. "Rosalia," as the Italians term it, means simply the repetition of a phrase half a tone higher—and so, of a sequence of harmony. What would become of many of our composers without it?—A. S. S.]

"PURE ENGLISH OPERA—AN ANTIDOTE."

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—I have read with a great deal of interest the letter in your valuable journal of the 15th inst., which is always foremost to uphold English talent. It is a disgrace and a blot upon us as a people—and a musical people, too—who lavish enormous sums of money annually upon foreign opera and foreign singers, that no one will come forward to encourage the English singer, composer, and author. I am quite certain the public are getting tired of the "flimsy rubbish" and "crudities and nudities" which has so long disgraced our stage, and would willingly pay to see such charming operas as the Mountain Sylph, Amelia, Bohemian Girl, or the Daughter of St. Mark. I am one of those strange animals who believe we have authors and composers quite equal to the task of producing similar original works; and, in a short time, singers to execute them. I quite agree with your correspondent, Miss English Opera, "that music has the same claim upon the nation as her sister arts—art and science—and should be equally cared for," and could be raised to the very highest standard for a tithe of what is spent upon South Kensington. Do let us hope that the Duke of Edinburgh will take the matter seriously in hand, and a move will be made in the right direction, to place "English Opera" once more upon the stage in all her old refinement. This would be the means of imparting a purer taste to the rising generation, and clearing the atmosphere of our drawing-rooms, which is the cause of the present "fast (vulgar!) young lady" and "young gentleman!"—because they have become so familiar with the coarse style of singing and acting in burlesques—it has permeated like a pestilence!—and the only antidote is pure English Opera. Everybody knows what a generous-hearted Englishman the Earl of Dudley is; whose office as President of the Royal Academy of Music at once stamps his Lordship as the leading patron of music in England, and most nobly he has proved himself to be so in many instances. I am quite sure the claim of "English Opera" only wants being brought before his Lordship by the leading composers, and they would not only have his deep sympathy but all his influence to bring it to a successful issue.—Yours, &c.,

R. C.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Mr. W. F. Taylor, the solo pianist and director of the series of twelve concerts that have lately taken place in the Museum of Fire Arms, Peckham Rye, had a complimentary benefit given to him on Monday last, the 17th inst., when he had the assistance of the Misses Edith and Gertrude Holman Andrews, Miss Staddon, Mr. Carter, Mr. Wigg, (a new tenor, who has just been appointed soloist at Christ Church, Lancaster Gate,) Mr. Levisohn, Mr. Tom Browne, &c., all of whom acquitted themselves to the entire satisfaction of a numerous audience. The Misses Andrews well sustained their rising reputation, and sang their duets, accompanied by Mr. Taylor, in an artistic manner. Miss Edith won an enthusiastic recall for "I leave my heart at home," by Mr. Taylor, and Miss Gertrude for a song by Sir Henry Bishop. Mr. Wigg, who has a pure tenor voice, made a marked effect in Mr. Taylor's "Friends again" (companion song to "Memory Green.") Both Miss Staddon and Mr. Levisohn fairly won recalls, the lady for "She wore a wreath of roses," and the gentleman for the "Village Blacksmith." In the instrumental part was included an Andante, Minuet, and Trio (M.S.), from a quartet by W. F. Taylor, admirably played by the composer and Messrs. Tom Browne, Spiller, and Imhoff. It was very favourably received, but we must hear the whole before giving critical judgment upon it. Mr. Taylor and his very little pupil, Miss Hamilton, won each an encore for their performances of Mr. Taylor's Fantasias, "Scotland," and "Afloat;" and Mr. Donajowski gave good aid in accompanying the vocal music.

Mr. Robert Temple, assisted by his pupils, gave, on Thursday the 6th inst., an evening concert at the National Schools, Portland Town, St. John's Wood. The programme was both well selected and satisfactorily carried out. Among the most pleasing performances were Mrs. Noble's artistic rendering of J. P. Knight's song, "She wore a wreath of roses;" "The Pilot," sung with effect and feeling by Mr. Arthur Liberty; and Hérold's overture to Zampa, charmingly executed as a pianoforte duet by Miss Bessie Strong and the concert-giver. Mr. Robert Temple, through the efficiency of his pupils, has good reason to congratulate himself on the complete success of the entertainment.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard Blagrove's first concertina and pianoforte recital took place on Thursday evening week, at the Beethoven Rooms, before a numerous and select audience. The first piece in the programme was Regondi's and Oberthür's brilliant Duet on Oberon, for concertina and piano, splendidly played by the bénéficiaires. Miss Edith Holman Andrews (who sang in place of Miss Hancock, announced in the programme,) obtained deserved success in some songs by Linley, Blumenthal, and Sullivan. Miss Jenny Pratt was deservedly applauded in Rossini's "Di tanti palpiti," and was greatly admired for the style in which she gave songs by Mr. W. H. Eayres and Miss Virginia Gabriel. Mrs. R. Blagrove played with exquisite taste and fine expression Beethoven's Sonata in C sharp minor (the "Moonlight Sonata"), and performed most brilliantly Signor Tito Mattei's "Grande Valse de Concert"; she also joined her husband in J. S. Bach's Sonata in E major (No. 3), of which the original violin part was arranged for the concertina. Besides the concerted pieces mentioned, Mr. R. Blagrove played a Concerto for concertina, by Bosen; the "Misèrere" from the Trovatore; and a fantasia of his own composition, on Signor Schira's fine opera, Nicolo di Lapi, in all of which his playing was greatly admired.

Madame Greiffenhagen's Soirée Musicale.—Madame Greiffenhagen, a pupil of the late M. Auber, who may be recollected as Miss Helen Condel, when prima donna in Balfe's opera, The Castle of Aymon, during Mr. Maddox's operatic management at the Princess's Theatre, gave a musical Soirée at 10, Upper Bedford Place, which was fully attended. Several choruses were given by a choir of fresh voices, drilled by Madame Greiffenhagen, selected from Guillaume Tell, Mercadante's Vestale, &c. The Misses Nash, in "Lift thine eyes," from Elijah, sang extremely well, as did Miss Helen Muir and Messrs. Mann and Barclay, in a duet from La Favorita and Il Barbiere. Miss K. Shury, in Adam's song (with clarionet obliggato, Mr. Cattermole), "Le Retour à la Montague," gave much pleasure. Besides being a clarionet player, Mr. Cattermole is a vocalist, and showed his talent to advantage in a duet with Miss Henley, Miss Emily Muir sang most artistically Benedict's Variations de Concert on "The Carnival of Venice," and was deservedly applauded by all present, as was also Mr. Kenningham, in a charming song of Francesco Berger's, "At last." Mr. Alexander Billet delighted the audience by a most admirable performance of one of his own pianoforte solos. The Soirée was a success, and Madame Greiffenhagen has reason to be gratified.

Mrs. John Macfarren gave a miscellaneous concert in St. John's Schools, Angell Town, on Thursday, February 13th, which formed one of a series of performances in aid of the St. John's Schools and other charities of the district. The vocalists were Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Agnes Drummond, Miss Alice Barnett, and Mr. Henry Guy, who exerted themselves to the manifest satisfaction of an audience of seven hundred persons. Miss Jessie Royd and Mr. Henry Guy were extremely effective in the late Vincent Wallace's duet, "O, Maritana." Miss Royd was encored in Mr. G. A. Macfarren's "Somebody," Mr. Guy in "The death of Nelson," and Miss Drummond in a Scotch ballad. Mrs. Macfarren bowed her acknowledgments to the great applause which followed both her solos,—pieces by Schulhoff and Brissac.

PROVINCIAL.

Edinburgh.—The Orchestral Festival took place as announced, and was a great success. Apropos of it, an Edinburgh paper says:—

"We cannot close this final notice of the Orchestral Festival without some brief acknowledgment of the manner in which Professor Oakeley has discharged the responsible duties falling to his share in connection with it. That, in so comparatively short a time after the severe accident which befell him last year, he should have thrown into the arrangements for the Festival the amount of energy necessary to make it so complete a success as it has proved, speaks volumes for his devotion to his work, and his determination to perform that work in the way that will be most beneficial to the whole population of Edinburgh. The music lovers of this city have every year greater reason to understand the difference between a zealous and a perfunctory fulfilment of the public duties attaching to the Musical Chair of the University. We believe that Professor Oakeley selected all the orchestral works that have been presented during the Festival, with one slight exception, and the selection is one that does infinite credit to his taste and judgment. Masterpieces of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Bach, Mendelssohn, Weber, Chopin, Schumann, Schubert, and Rossini, have been presented; and we do not know that a wider choice could well have been desired, especially when it is borne in mind that variety and novelty have been kept in view in the selection."

Manchester.—(From a Correspondent).—Mr. De Jong's last concert introduced, for the first time, in the Free Trade Hall, and the second time in Manchester, (her first appearance here was at Mr. Horton C. Allison's concert, last February,) an excellent young contralto singer, Miss Jessie Bond. She sang, with great feeling, Blumenthal's "Sailor boy's farewell," and Randegger's "Sleep, dearest, sleep" (to which Mr. Van Biene played an obliggato accompaniment on the violoncello), and she was loudly encored in both. The other features of the concert were Mr. De Jong's own Rondo Capriccioso, which he played to perfection, (receiving an ovation, in response to which he repeated it,) and three organ solos (one of which was a portion of Mr. Prout's admirable new organ Concerto) ably performed by Mr. Bridge. The orchestral works were the overtures to Don Giovanni and La Gazza Ladra, a selection from Robert le Diable, and Mendelssohn's Athalie March.

Abingdon.—In the Oxford Chronicle, of Feb. 15th, we read as follows:—

"The concert given in the County Hall, on Tuesday evening, in aid of the restoration and enlargement of the organ in St. Helen's Church, was a great success. The following artists were engaged:—Madame Thaddeus Wells, Mr. Henry Nicholson (solo flautist), Mr. T. Hunt, Mr. Orlando Christian, and Miss Lazarus—solo pianoforte and accompanist. Madame Thaddeus Wells, in 'Kathleen Mavourneen,' elicited the heartiest applause and acknowledged the encore by singing 'She wore a wreath of roses.' After her next song, Bishop's 'Lo! here the gentle lark' (accompanied by Mr. Nicholson), the audience again demanded an encore. Mr. Nicholson's flute solos were among the finest performances ever heard in this hall, and drew forth a most hearty encore. The singing of both Mr. Christian and Mr. Hunt was highly appreciated. We must not omit to speak of the pianoforte solos of Miss Lazarus, admirably performed and warmly received. Mr. F. K. Couldrey, organist of St. Helen's Church, under whose superintendence this musical treat was brought about, deserves unqualified praise.

Nottingham.—In noticing the recent performance of Sir Michael Costa's Naaman at Nottingham, the local Journal, after awarding due praise to the magnificent singing of Mr. Santley, observed:—

"Mdlle. Enriquez gave fine interpretation to the recitative, 'Come, and on thy bosom press me,' spoken by the loving Timna to her leprosy-stricken husband, who exclaims, through the mouth of Mr. Vernon Rigby, 'Embrace me not; I must be strange to thee,' the famous tenor giving appropriate expression to the mournful sadness of the unfortunate Naaman. If, however, Mr. Rigby was successful in his rendering of Naaman's earnest appeal to his wife not to embrace him on account of his ills, he was much more so in the air in which Naaman invokes death. He sang these beautiful and touching verses with the most profound expression, and, to use an old and hackneyed phrase, almost 'electrified' his audience by his rendering of the last verse, in which Naaman cries in the bitternss of his soul 'Oh! that I here might die.' The next part of the performance which took our attention, and, indeed, the attention of the whole of the audience, was the singing of Mdlle. Carola. We have never had the pleasure of hearing this talented lady in Nottingham on any former occasion, but we can safely say that she ranks amongst the first of oratorio singers, and there are few indeed, whose voices are better adapted to interpret the music of Naaman. The freshness and exquisite beauty of her voice —now loud and thrilling, and now soft and gentle—coupled with a certain delicacy of finish, charmed the whole audience. The fair artist was cheered to the echo."

SALTASH.—A local paper says:—

"On behalf of the funds of the Saltash Literary Institution, which, it is to be hoped, will be materially benefited by the effort, a concert was given last evening, and, musically, was highly successful. Miss Elcho, a pianist of note, who is stated to have been very successful during the past season in London, was the prominent artist, and her execution showed that she in every way deserved the high position which she has obtained. The other vocalists and instrumentalists were the Misses Jones, J. Frost, L. Frost, E. Frost, and Mr. Matthews, local amateurs, each of whom evinced considerable talent."

TAUNO.—Mrs. John Macfarren gave a performance of pianoforte and vocal music in the new Assembly Rooms, on Friday, Feb. 7, assisted by Miss Agnes Drummond and Mr. Henry Guy. The number of executants being limited to three, it is remarkable how great an amount of variety was included in the programme. Mrs. John Macfarren contributed several brilliant and well contrasted solos, in each and all of which she was enthusiastically applauded. Among these may specially be cited Beethoven's "Moonlight Sonata;" the tenderness, the passion, and all the subtle charms of which she fully revealed. The fresh and very telling views of Miss Agnes Drummond (soprano), and Mr. Henry Guy (tenor), were heard to great advantage in three duets. Miss Agnes Drummond was encored in Mr. G. A Macfarren's "The beating of my own heart," as was Mr. Henry Guy in the same composer's "My own, my guiding star," and his own ballad, "Philomel." Mrs. Macfarren repeated a portion of Brissac's Welsh Fantasia by general desire.

WAIFS.

The advent of the Italian Opera troupe in Boston creates quite a stir among the lovers of music, and furnishes a ready topic of conversation to all classes. It imparts a life and spirit to many branches of business; the milliners are in their element, the gentlemen's furnishing stores are rejoiced, for there is an unwonted activity in white kids and delicate neckties. Opticians are in the most smiling mood at the ready sale of double-barrelled lorgnettes, and hackmen are temporarily insane by lavish prosperity. As for music stores and publishers of books of the opera, they are thronged with customers; and the visit of Lucca is generally looked upon by a large class as a grateful dispensation of Divine Providence.—Boston Globe.

The Italian Opera Company has been even more successful in Boston than the managers anticipated. It was supposed the late disastrous fire in that city would have a bad effect; but not only was the first performance of the season attended by a fashionable and crowded audience, but almost every succeeding one has been the same. Pauline Lucca has literally captured the Bostonians. The press, without exception, mentions both her vocal and dramatic powers in the highest terms, and at the opera she has received plaudits and bouquets enough to satisfy any prima donna. When leaving Boston the company will go to Hartford and Providence, and then, perhaps, to Chicago and other Western cities, expecting to return to New York in the latter part of February or beginning of March.—New York Herald.

Tannhaüser was to be produced at Brussels on the 19th inst.

Auber's Premier Jour de Bonheur was to be revived, on Thursday last, at the Opéra Comique.

Mr. William Mazzinghi was appointed, last Monday, librarian of "The William Salt" library, at Stafford.

The German copyright of La Coupe du Roi de Thule has been bought by Spina, of Vienna, for 12,000 francs.

Signora Isabella Fabbrica, a contralto of note in Italy, has just died at Lisbon, where she had for some time resided.

It is said that Herr Strackosh has engaged M. Capoul for his American campaign at the end of the present year.

Salt Lake is to have a new theatre, "void of sticks and other priesthoodist eccentricities," as we learn from the Gentile print of that ilk.

Mr. Mathews, of the Waterford Cathedral, was appointed organist of Queenstown Parish Church, on Wednesday, in place of Mr. Henry, resigned.

The latest example of laconic reporting is:—"An Indian opened a can of nitro-glycerine with his tomahawk, and left. Search resulted in 'no Indian.'"

"Leo and Lotos" at Niblo's, New York, has proved a greater hit than was anticipated in the beginning, and it continues to draw excellent houses.

The valuable library of the late Edwin Forrest was destroyed by fire on the 14th ult., involving a loss of 20,000 dols. The Shakespearian folio of 1623, valued at 8,000 dols., was among the books burned.

Le Monde Artiste tells us that the rivalry of two singers resulted in a free fight among the audience assembled at the Sira theatre. The manager parted the combatants by ordering the firemen to play upon them with the engine. Cold water calmed their noble rage.

It appears that Carl Beethoven, the scapegrace nephew of the great musician, left a widow, four daughters, and one son. The widow still lives in Vienna; of the daughters, three are married and have large families; while the son, Louis van Beethoven, is a poor journalist at Munich.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Ripon have presented to Dr. Spark, of Leeds, a souvenir in the shape of a gold pin set with nine brilliants, and valued at one hundred guineas, as a memento of the success of the ode composed by the Doctor on the coming of age of the Earl de Grey last month.

One of the features of Mr, Sothern's "Brother Sam," which still holds its place at Wallack's, is the remarkably faultless English of the London fop. Lord Dundreary talks of Sam as in this country, which will account for the fact that he can speak the language correctly.—New York Herald.

Playgoers with travelling proclivities may be recommended to see the "Message from the Sea" at the Surrey Theatre. Miss Virginia Blackwood's Mog, the maid-of-all-work, rejoicing in mischief, and with feelings all on virtue's side, is a veritable "creation" of a kind not often to be witnessed.

Kate Field tartly says:—"It is a crime, apparently, to be a contralto. The world has gone mad over sopranos. Only shriek on C alt, and you bring down the house. Sing a contralto largo, with exquisite phrasing and voice, and applause will be comparatively mild. Truly, as has been said, art now is loud; whereas, formerly, it was long."

We are glad to hear of the success achieved in opera, at Leghorn, by Signor Ugo Talbo (Mr. Hugh Brennan), who was, not long ago, well known among London musical amateurs. He appeared as Faust in Gounod's opera, and fairly overcame Italian prejudice against him as an Englishman. Mr. Brennan is engaged to sing at Leghorn throughout the Carnival.

Nothing will impede waves of sound better than leaves of plants. If a lecturer were to attempt to deliver a discourse in a conservatory, he would find it difficult to make himself heard, even within a few yards of his audience. In a building where the walls echo, it is only necessary to place round it a few large plants in boxes; there will then be no reflecting sound.

Wagner and Liszt Concerts are shortly to be given at Hanover Square. An eminent architect has declared that the roof of the concert-room is strong enough to withstand the strain. Cotton-wool will be provided for those who are anxious about the drums—of their ears; and list slippers for those who wish to execute a fugato movement during the Liszt Concerto.—Hornet.

The following letter was sent to the Editor of the New York Musical Gazette:—

"Mr. Edtur,—I send you a peas of mussick wich it is my furst chomp position in mussick wich if it wirthy of a plas in the N. Y. Mussick Gas it i shal be mutch obbligd and wont charg you anny thing fur printing my peas in the Gas it—Yures Trnley

The Boston Journal contained the following, the morning after the performance of Ambroise Thomas's Mignon:—"At the Opera last night, a French work, translated into Italian, was performed before a house full of Americans, with the following remarkable distribution of nationalities in the leading rôles: one Austrian, one American, one Spaniard, one German, one Englishman, one Frenchman, and a single Italian. The performance was conducted by a Moravian."

A farmer who wished to invest the accumulation of his industry in United States' securities, went into a broker's office to obtain some "five-twenties." The clerk inquired, "What denomination will you have them, sir?" Having never heard that word used excepting to distinguish sects, the farmer, after a little deliberation, replied, "Well, you may give me part in Old School Presbyterian, to please the old lady; but give me the heft on't in Free-Will Baptist."

Beethoven's Choral Symphony is said to have been magnificently performed at the Paris Conservatoire on Sunday week. Its reception was enthusiastic beyond precedent. The Symphony was repeated on Sunday last.

The second centenary of Molière will be celebrated in the Palais de l'Industrie next May. Special performances of his works will be given eight days in succession by the artists of the Théâtre Français, the Odeon, and the French theatre of St. Petersburgh.

The Second Subscription Concert of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Barnby, is announced to take place on Wednesday next (Ash Wednesday), on which occasion the Messiah will be performed, the solo singers being Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Spiller, Madame. Patey, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Foli. Dr. Stainer will preside at the Organ, and the Band and Chorus will number 1200. Judging from the effect produced by the Society at the last Concert, a fine performance may be anticipated.

Breslau.—The members of Soller's Musical Union lately gave a highly successful performance of Mendelssohn's Athalie music, under the direction of their conductor, Herr Adolph Golde. The solos were entrusted to Mdlle. Breidenstein, of this place, Mdlles. Dotter and Schmidt, of the Court Theatre, Weimar, Mdlle. Ethel, of the same theatre, undertaking the spoken part. The harp-music was creditably executed by Mdme. von Kavácsies. The programme of Part I. contained, among other things, Herr H. Dorn's Nibelungen overture.

Frankfort-on-the-Maine.—Herr Joseph Joachim appeared at the Eighth Concert, and the Seventh Soirée for Chamber Music, given by the Museum Society. The magic of his name was evidenced by the fact that, on both occasions, the large concert-room could not show a vacant place. Among the pieces with which the great violinist delighted his admirers at the concert may be mentioned Schumann's "Abendlied;" Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; the Concerto in "Ungarische Weise;" and J. M. Leclair's "Sarabande und Tambourin," a piece dating from about the middle of the last century. At the Soirée for Chamber Music he took part in the Quartet, Op. 59, No. 2, in E minor, by Beethoven; in Haydn's Op. 74, No. 3, in G minor, and in Brahms' Sextet, Op. 18, in B flat major.

Rotterdam.—Herr and Mdme. Joachim appeared at the third concert given by the "Eruditio Musica" Society. Among the pieces performed were a Cantata, composed by Marcello, and scored by Herr Joachim, Beethoven's Violin Concerto, Schumann's Fantasia for Violin and Orchestra, and an Orchestral March, by Joachim. Mdme. Joachim sang several songs.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING

Price 12s.

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine, (Longman & Co.,) they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from, Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

PREFACE.

No country possesses more good voices than England, and many voices would be a fortune to their owners if they knew how to use them.

Vocal Exercises, however, are much neglected, owing, in a great measure, to their monotony of passage and of style.

The object of these Studies is to make practice as attractive as possible, and the Waltz form has therefore been chosen for its liveliness.

A selection has been made of passages best suited to give flexibility to the voice, and the six Waltzes here presented contain the germs of a thorough method of vocal practice.

The Italian language is preferred on account of the openness of the vowels; but these studies can be used advantageously without words, by simply "vocalising" on the vowel A (pronounced in Italian, Ah.)

Commas (,) are placed where breath is to be taken. At first, however, pupils should practise each study very slowly, and draw breath whenever found necessary.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country. The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. VAN PRAAG.

MR. VAN PRAAG, who has been for many years past well known to the members of the Musical Profession, and the public, as holding a responsible position at the principal Concert-rooms of the West End, is now, in his 74th year. In addition to his failing health and strength, he has also recently become a widower, and is, by this sad bereavement, left alone, with not a relative in England to aid or take care of him. He has children in California who wish him to go out to them, and it is his own desire, notwithstanding his age and infirmities, to do so. Want of means for undertaking so long and expensive a journey, which his children are unable to supply, however, preclude the possibility of his leaving England. Under these circumstances, a few friends, well able to bear witness to his respectability, honesty, and courtesy in the discharge of the duties he has so "well and worthily fulfilled," are anxious to raise a Subscription in his behalf, to which contributions are earnestly and respectfully requested.

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May! What joys at-tend thine ad-vent gay

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May!
What joys attend thine advent gay!
On every tree the birdies sing,
From hill and dale glad echoes ring;
The lark, inspir'd, to Heav'n ascends,
The gurgling brook in beauty wends
By mossy bank and grassy brae,
Where violets bloom and lambkins play.
Delightful Spring—sweet month of May
What joys attend thine advent gay!

"ST. PATRICK AT TARA."

CANTATA.

By PROFESSOR GLOVER.

Dedicated by permission to
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ARTHUR PATRICK.

Price 3s.; bound in cloth, gilt, 5s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"The publication of Professor Glover's Cantata, 'St. Patrick at Tara,' will be gladly welcomed by choral societies, requiring a work of moderate difficulty but extensive interest. The subject, essentially national in character, is, moreover, one that could scarcely fail to awaken the attention of most people, but more especially Irishmen, who will doubtless see that the spirit of the ancient bards has not entirely passed away from the more prosaic times. For freedom of melodic treatment and characteristic harmony Mr. Glover's Cantata deserves to be widely known. There is a special interest attached to the work, inasmuch as H.R.H. Prince Arthur Patrick has been pleased to accept the dedication of a theme which treats of a period of ever-living interest."—Morning Post.

"This cantata, it may be remembered, was performed at St. George's Hall last year, and was remarkably well received. It has now been published in a convenient and elegant volume, uniform with Professor Glover's edition of Moore's "Irish Melodies." The theme of the cantata is the introduction of Christianity into Ireland, and the poetical selections set to music are taken from the works of Ossian, Moore, Clarence Mangan, and other poets. The peculiar and distinguishing characteristics of the composition consist in the intermingling of music of a national with music of a sacred description, which produces a striking and not unpleasing effect. There are several pretty melodies in this cantata, among which a contralto solo, "I often wish," and a bass song, "Lord have mercy upon me," stand out conspicuously. As the execution of "St. Patrick at Tara" does not present any formidable difficulties, we should say it is likely to become a favourite with amateur choral societies, as well as with their audiences."—The Echo.

"We must not omit to mention a song entitled 'The Mariner' which is an excellent composition, by Louis Diehl. It was well executed by Signor Foli, and was encored as much for the beauty of the composition, as the excellence of the singing."—The Observer.

THE HARP.

(From "Another World.")

"Music . . . . the emanation of the concentrated light of the soul. . . . . The language of the angels."

The harp is our principal musical instrument. We have one that is portable, and in form like a lyre; but our great harp is much larger than yours, differently constructed, and far more effective, combining, as it does, in its tones, all the delicacy, expression, and oneness of a single executant, with the brilliancy and power of a combined body of performers.

It rests on a ball firmly placed on a massive pedestal, which is easily moved from one place to another by means of small wheels. The ball on which the harp rests revolves in a socket, so that the instrument can easily be placed in the position the performer desires, and then, by means of a bolt, fixed firmly in its place. No support from the executant is needed. The harp does not rest upon him in any way, and he has, at the same time, entire power over every part.

The instrument is divided into four sets of chords. The first only of these four sets is touched by the player, but on any of the first set being intoned, each corresponding string of the three other sets, all of which are stouter and more powerful than the set played upon, resounds in harmony.

The power given out by the three sets of strings is proportioned to the sound produced on the first set by the performer, as the force of an echo is stronger or weaker according as the sound producing it is increased or diminished in volume.

In the framework of the harp there are conducting strings of electricity, which unite all the rest with the first set and with each other. The electricity is generated by a liquid contained in a small tube, and is set in motion by the movement of the strings of the first set of chords. The tube can be placed in, or removed from, the instrument with the greatest ease; without it, the first set alone responds to the player's touch.

The musician has the power of varying and depressing the notes of the instrument in a marvellous manner, so as to produce instantaneously the most delicate or the most powerful sounds, with endless modulations and variety of tone. I have heard echoes and responses given out as though the music had been breathed from a great distance;—the gentlest whispers were alternated with all the force of a band of music.

I could not, without much expenditure of time and labour, and without explaining our science of music, which is altogether different to yours, convey to you an adequate notion of the effect produced by a skilful player. I have seen a multitude turned away from evil designs by the exquisite playing of the harpist—their passions calmed, their thoughts raised from earth to heaven.

By the aid of little knobs on the instrument, the diapason can be changed to an extent that you would not credit, for it has reference to a system different to yours. The compass and extent of sound given by our harps is very considerably higher than the notes produced by your violins, and deeper than the lowest notes given by your contrabassi.

We do not count by octaves, but, by touching twos or threes, different characters of sounds are produced, indicated by names such as—gaiety, joy, melancholy, truthfulness, fickleness in some things, fickleness in all things, an exalted mind, poetry, domestic peace, hatred, jealousy, morbid sensibility, pardon, receiving again into favour, flowers, decay of health, sickness, returning health, love in a gentle degree, love in a sublime degree, doubting, also trusting love, loneliness, disappointment, ambition.

These and many other sentiments are expressed by strains that go directly to the soul, and without the need of words. As all in Montalluyah understand the language the music is intended to convey, the player, without opening his lips, can express himself on the harp as clearly as by discourse; and two persons playing can hold a conversation.

As you have certain sounds responding to Do, Re, Mi, &c., so have we certain sounds and harmonies that convey certain expressions; for instance: "I esteem you;" "I feel you in the pulsations of my blood," i.e. "I love you." Or perhaps the vibrations of the same harmony would be varied so as to be higher or lower, sharp or flat; and the player would convey that he felt the presence of his beloved in the appropriate vibration of his nerves.

In another harmony, he would compare the admired object to some beautiful soft bird like the Zudec, or a pet like the Kamouska.

On the occasion of a love scene between a great harpist and a lady, I have heard the following, amongst many other sentiments, expressed by the harp: First, Lenordi, the harpist, expressed his glowing sympathy, his admiration of beauty, of goodness, his pleading to be heard, his hope that no other occupied the lady's thoughts, his despair if his prayers were not listened to, hope, expressions of eternal devotion; in short, all the possible outpourings of a loving heart. It would be too tedious to tell you all he conveyed, but he ended thus, "Thou art pure as the dew upon the leaf of opening day . . . . but like to that dew wilt thy love pass away!"

Giola—the lady—took her place at the harp, and played a response expressing the following:—"Would I might believe these flattering vibrations, and the bright hopes raised within an hour to wither in a day.

"Could they but last, the skies above would pale beneath their brightness.

"Yet I would not doubt thee; thy every look makes life a dream of love."

The player then made excuses for her seeming enthusiasm, by declaring that even inanimate matter is moved by his soul-stirring strains.

"Every flower and every tendril is moved by thee, for, like thee, they are fresh and gently gay." . . . .

This led eventually to a "choice" meeting, and the marriage was attended with many interesting incidents. Their history would of itself form a curious romance!

Every one competent is educated in the meaning of the harp sounds, and the instruction in this branch of study commences at an early age. Certain sentences are written, and a sound is given out and repeated till the young person thoroughly understands what he has heard. Then the sentence is renewed, perhaps, in connection with another sentence, the accompanying sound is given, and, in a short time, the student says the word or sentence accompanying every sound, and thus he soon learns how to use these sounds, and how to vary and combine them, just as an alphabet or series of words would be used by an able writer.

When the instrument is used as a subsidiary agent, and the player accompanies his own or another's voice with words, he plays an accompaniment implying words, but not so as to attract attention from the singer. There are certain accompaniments which are adapted to anything that might be sung. These, however, the player can vary if his talent is sufficient.

Our songs are generally spontaneous effusions, but there are songs with which certain words are permanently associated.

The harp itself is beautiful as a work of sculptural art. Around its framework most elegant and tasteful ornaments are executed with the minutest perfection—small birds of variegated plumage perched on graceful foliage of green enamel, with flowers in their natural colours, so executed as closely to resemble nature. The birds, flowers, and foliage are connected with the chords of the harp, and conceal from view small vases or reservoirs set in the framework of the instrument. From these, with every touch of the chords, a beautiful fragrance is exhaled, the force or delicacy of which depends on the more powerful or gentler strains produced from the instruments.

The instant the player strikes the chords, the little birds open their wings, the flowers quiver in gentle action, and then, from the vases, are thrown off jets of perfume. The more strongly the chords are touched, the more powerfully does the fragrance play around.

In tender passages the perfume gradually dies away, till it becomes so faint as to be appreciated only by the most delicate organizations. The result, however, is, that the sense is gratified, the heart touched, and the whole soul elevated. I have seen the most ardent natures calmed and rendered gentle by the divine strains of this angelic instrument.

It is said that in the angelic spheres flowers breathe music as well as fragrance, and that the sound itself has form, colour, and perfume. This belief suggested the thought of uniting them in harmonious concert for the gratification of those who had exercised the gifts accorded them by heaven to a good end. As they had gained their position by their own merit, it was sought in every way to increase their happiness and their enjoyments. Nothing that art could produce was thought too good for them.

I loved the world. The wicked only are impatient and discontented. I knew that blessings are everywhere about us, though we are expected to exercise our intelligence to make them available; and whilst I inculcated that "intemperance is not enjoyment," and that "intemperance destroyed the power of enjoyment," I did not hesitate to tell my people that the world and the blessings everywhere abounding are given us to enjoy, and that, like guests invited to a banquet, we were neither to run riot, nor to reject the good things offered us in love.

WAGNER IN LONDON.

(From the "Pall Mall Gazette.")

Astonishing rumours have reached England from time to time during the last year or two as to the doings of Herr Wagner at, and in connection with, Bayreuth. Whatever may be thought of Herr Wagner as a composer, there can be no doubt as to the power and influence exercised by him in the character of writer, courtier, and organizer of his own successes. In criticising the works of other composers he has always had something striking and original to say. A democrat in early days, he has, nevertheless, contrived to make himself the friend of princes; and if any further proof of his talent were required, it could be found in the high political skill with which he has persuaded Germans of all classes and conditions, from the Emperor and several kings downwards, to aid him in erecting and fitting up a theatre for the performance of his own works. Herr Wagner is, after all, the true unifier of Germany. There is still some coldness between the Emperor William and the King of Bavaria; but both these monarchs, major and minor, agree in looking favourably upon Herr Wagner, and both have taken shares in the Bayreuth enterprise. North Germans and South Germans, friends of unity and "particularists," Protestants and Catholics, are all of one way of thinking in presence of Herr Wagner—that way being the precise way, and none other, held by Herr Wagner himself. What is still more extraordinary is the fact that many of Herr Wagner's most enthusiastic admirers have not only read his most eloquent books and listened to his impressive conversation, but have heard his music. Some even are musicians themselves; and when a musician becomes a Wagnerite he naturally proves a fanatic in the cause; there are not many of them, however. Educated in what, according to Wagner, are false traditions, musicians as a rule, whether composers or executants, and singers especially among the latter, dislike his music; and the chief propagandists of Wagnerism have been found among writers who, for the most part, and for excellent reasons, are very little prejudiced in regard to musical subjects. Baudelaire, whose praise, when he did indulge in laudation, was never lukewarm, considered Wagner the greatest of all composers; and Mr. Swinburne, appreciating Baudelaire's genius, is said to extend his admiration to Baudelaire's favourite composer. The French novelist, Champfleury, is, or was, another Wagnerite; and Théophile Gautier, who wrote very brilliantly about music, but without liking it, held Wagner in considerable esteem, as, to this moment, do several of Gautier's literary followers. Berlioz, who, like Wagner, wrote and talked effectively on musical subjects, and, like Wagner, professed utter contempt for such musical pigmies as Rossini, found also a certain number of warm admirers among a certain number of the writers of his time.

Great composers, however, have always addressed the world not through literature, but exclusively through music. No arguments, no sort of propagandism should be necessary to direct public attention to artistic results which, in the case of musical works, must surely speak for themselves. But even in his own country we believe Wagner to be less known as a musical composer than as a controversialist on the subject of music; and in England it is an indisputable fact that such celebrity as attaches to his name is due partly to what he has written, partly to what has been written about him, and very little indeed to what he has composed. It is in Russia (once more like Berlioz), where every new and strange thing is sure to find admirers, that Wagner has made the greatest impression. There, and there only, he has become the founder of a school which includes at least two musicians of mark—Seroff, the composer of Judith, and as prolific a writer on musical subjects as the Master himself; and Dargomiski, who, out-Wagnering Wagner, dispenses not only with concerted pieces, but also with choruses, and, pushing realism in music to the last extremity, has discovered the art, of writing recitative in so natural a style that when the singers deliver it you scarcely know they are singing, and almost fancy they are speaking. Many years may be expected to elapse before the German master reaches the point to which his Russian imitator leaped almost at one bound. But Dargomiski, with his "realism" in music, is an example of what a composer may come to if he once enters on the Wagnerian path.

Meanwhile Wagner is being introduced or re-introduced to us in London; for it must not be forgotten that some twenty years ago he officiated one season as conductor at the Philharmonic Concerts, when several of his orchestral pieces were performed under his direction. Whether through the fault of the public or of the composer, certain it is that these works produced no favourable impression. Nor did the success of the first "Wagner Concert," which took place last week at the Hanover Square Rooms—the first concert devoted specially and exclusively, in this country, to Wagner's music—prove that music to be eminently acceptable, even to an audience composed largely of Germans, with many of whom the question of Wagner's merit is viewed, not so much from a musical as from a national and patriotic point of view. Much of the music performed was in accordance with the public taste, and much was in Wagner's latest style. But what was in accordance with the public taste was not in Wagner's latest style, and what was in Wagner's latest style was not in accordance with the public taste. We are merely stating facts without wishing to imply that Herr Wagner is to be judged by the likings or dislikings of his audience. It is worth noticing, all the same, that the pieces most applauded were those belonging to his earlier works, which have been often performed, and may often be performed again, without its being at all necessary to construct for that purpose a theatre at Bayreuth or elsewhere. For our part we like and admire the Flying Dutchman (which, however, is never mentioned by professed Wagnerites, and which Wagner himself is said to regard as an error of his youth); we like and admire Tannhäuser, and we like and admire the little of Lohengrin that we happen to have heard on the stage. Wagner loses more than most composers by being heard piecemeal in a concert-room; for the creator of the "art-work of the future" does not "lisp in numbers," and his whole system is opposed to the elaboration and perfection of particular scenes which, however highly finished, cannot, he maintains, joined together, form a musico-dramatic work possessing unity, but only a musical medley, or mosaic. In London he must be heard at concerts or not at all. But to judge of him as a stage-composer one should witness a performance of Tannhäuser at Berlin, or, better still, of Lohengrin at Munich, or, best of all, the longest works of his last period, as they are to be given when a theatre fit for their reception and production has been provided at Bayreuth. For this last opportunity, however, it will be necessary to wait, desirable to attend Wagner concerts in aid of the Bayreuth fund, and commendable to join the guarantee committee which is to ensure the organizers of these concerts against the possibility of loss.

The test to which Herr Wagner's music is subjected by being presented as concert music is, indeed, a severe one. In representation his operas owe much to the poem, (which Herr Wagner, who was a librettist before he was a composer, writes himself,) much to the mise-en-scène, much to the fact that they are eminently fitted for the stage. His chief rule of operatic art is that music must be regarded as a means, not an end, in contradistinction to the ordinary view, according to which the libretto is merely a string of words for supporting and connecting the various pieces, following one after another, as in a concert. Oddly enough, while Wagner, in theory at least, sets a limit to the predominance of music in opera, he seems to exaggerate its importance as a means of expression in instrumental pieces connected with opera. Thus an overture by Wagner is supposed to say all sorts of things which never could be understood except by hearers already admitted into the secret. It is supposed to say some of these things explicitly, and now and then (as enthusiasts maintain), "humorously;" as if it were not enough for music to tell its own story, without attempting to depict and even to describe ("humorously" or otherwise) things external to it and beyond its reach. The very vagueness of music is one of its charms; and in seeking unduly to extend its sphere, so as to make it do the work of painting, and even of poetry, composers do not add to its power, but seriously diminish it. In the acting portions, however, of his "art-work" Wagner lets notes wait upon words, intensifying their dramatic effect, imparting to them their true musical colour; while the orchestra has still a very important part to play, not as a mere subservient accompanist, like the orchestra of the Italian composers, but as a semi-independent dramatic agent, performing functions almost as significant as those of the chorus in a Greek tragedy. This conception of opera reminds one of Gluck, whose orchestra, however, was infinitely less eloquent than that of Wagner. So far, indeed, is Wagner's operatic scheme from being new that one of the most notable processes employed in it—that of announcing the entry of each character by a particular orchestral phrase—was first made use of by Monteverde in the earliest, or one of the earliest, operas on record. It is noticeable, too, that in the earliest operas the personages delivered all their dialogue in a sort of recitative, formal tunes being generally reserved, as in the Wagnerian operas, for choruses, dances, and marches. In his latest manner, Wagner seems inclined to replace squarely-defined tune by so-called "continuous melody" even in march music, of which, at the Wagner concert, we had a specimen in his vigorous Kaiser Marsch. Still, as a rule, a march in music must be looked upon as something to be marched to; and the bold, effective themes of which the Kaiser Marsch is mainly made up convey no idea of the sort of music which forms the substance of Wagner's operas. They remind one rather of Meyerbeer, as the well-known and undoubtedly effective Tannhäuser March (which, again, is no specimen of Wagnerian music in general,) must remind every one who hears it of Weber.

At the first of the Wagner concerts a very fine orchestra, under Mr. Dannreuther's able conductorship, did full justice to the Tannhäuser overture, the overture to the Meistersinger, the above-mentioned Kaiser Marsch, and various instrumental and semi-instrumental pieces from Lohengrin. Nor must we forget the prayer from Rienzi, which, like the overture to Tannhäuser, the Lohengrin selection, and the Kaiser Marsch, excited much admiration. Encores are scarcely a criterion: but however that may be, the pieces most applauded and re-demanded were those of Wagner's early manner; and the public can form but little idea from the Wagnerian entertainment provided for them at the Hanover Square Rooms of the sort of treat that will await, at Bayreuth, those who, by becoming guarantors to the extent of five pounds, will "secure the privilege of choosing four reserved seats at half-price." They will hear a fine singer, however, in Herr Franz Diener, who, at the Wagner Society's first concert, sang, with much earnestness and with all the dramatic power which Wagner's vocal music absolutely requires, Lohengrin's expressive song to Elsa, and Sigismund's intricate "Love song," in the Walküre—the second of the operas included in the Niebelungen series destined for the Bayreuth Festival.

GREGORIAN DEMONSTRATION AT ST. PAUL'S.

Yesterday evening there was a musical service of an unusual character in our Metropolitan Cathedral. Every amateur is aware that a society exists called the London Gregorian Choral Association, the object of which is to restore what is called "plain song," as set of old to many important parts of our Book of Common Prayer. They labour under the belief that the most efficacious way to bring this about is to resort to the old Gregorian form of musical worship. It need hardly be said that the psalms and canticles of our Church Service are more or less unrhythmical; and it is asserted that the so-called "Gregorian tones," on account of their general independence of rhythm, are best suited to the purpose under consideration. The Rev. Thomas Helmore, Precentor of St. Paul's, has been the foremost promoter of this movement; and both his status as a clergyman and his known ability as a musician entitle him, and any project he takes seriously in hand, to all consideration. Let him, then, speak for himself, for it may fairly be surmised that he has had a chief hand in drawing up the prospectus, which explains the objects of the London Gregorian Choral Association:—

"The object of this association is to circulate information on the subject of the ancient plain song, to amend the actual performance of this part of the authorized music of the Church, and, by well-conducted and heartily-performed solemn services in various churches in London (which are, or may become, each in its own locality, centres of attraction and good models for imitation), to exemplify the various portions of the plain song, as set to our English Book of Common Prayer. It is desired to disarm prejudice, overcome objections, and to commend to wider acceptance a style of congregational worship suited as well to the small congregation of two or three gathered together in the name of our Lord as to the assembled thousands of devout worshippers in cathedrals and the larger parish churches on occasions of great choral gatherings. The association wishes to make it more generally understood that the restoration of plain song is an addition to the resources of musical art, as applied to the public worship of the Church, and by no means opposed to any true development of it. Both ancient and modern music may and ought to be combined, in well assorted proportion and in harmonious agreement, to swell the universal tribute of prayer, praise, and thanksgiving to Him whose honour and glory the Gregorian Association desires to promote by all its efforts."

In a brief sermon, delivered by Dr. Jenner, ex-Bishop of Dunedin, who chose for his text, Acts chapter iv., verse 24—"They lifted up their voice to God with one accord"—the argument in favour of church choral worship and congregational singing, by means of the "plain song" (or tune in which all the congregation, if so disposed, may join,) was amplified in all its necessary details; and the right reverend preacher emphatically gave it as his opinion that the Gregorian music was fitter than any other for the purpose, if only because it affords no opportunities for individual display, and thus puts the humblest member of the congregation on the same level as the highest.

Into the long-vexed question between the Gregorianists and anti-Gregorianists, the former principally amateurs, the latter chiefly musicians, we have no space or inclination to enter. A whole page would be inadequate for an exhaustive discussion; and, if it were adequate, neither party would be convinced. A brief notice of yesterday evening's ceremonial must therefore suffice.

The church was filled in every part; and it is stated that the congregation, with the members of the choir, &c., might be reckoned, without exaggeration, a little short of 10,000. The singers, selected from the choirs of the various churches in London and its vicinity, aided by many enthusiastic Anglicans, who came, perhaps rather out of a very excusable curiosity than with any idea of being converted to Gregorianism, numbered little short of 700—some 250, we are informed, as what is called "harmony choir," and between 400 and 500 as melody choir—to sing the tune, or "plain song," and thus to represent the congregation, who, it is hoped, will before long take courage and themselves join heartily in the musical part of the service. The whole of the musical arrangements had been prepared under the superintendence of Mr. C. Warwick Jordan, M.B. Oxon, (of St. Stephens, Lewisham,) for some time accredited organist of the Gregorian Association, and the result justifies us in giving him credit for more than common zeal and more than common ability. Besides the choir, Mr. Jordan had secured the services of Messrs. Phasey, Cousins, and Gilterman (euphonion), Hughes (ophicleide), Morrow, and a gentleman with whose name we are unacquainted, (trumpet), to aid and enrich the organ accompaniment. These, like the members of the united choirs, all wore surplices; and as the hymns, "Blessed city, Heavenly Salem" (evening), and "Behold, I lay a corner-stone" (morning), chosen from the Salisbury Hymnal, were being sung, their slow procession to their places in the choir, accompanied by many of the clergy and Bishop Jenner, was certainly imposing. The opening phrase of the Evening Hymn was given out by the trumpet alone, in anticipation of the voices, with fine effect. The "responses" to the prayers were taken, not from the immortal Tallis, but from the Guidetti and Janssen, after the arrangement of the Rev T. Helmore. They are very good; but Tallis's are better. The Psalm, "Praise the Lord, O my soul" (CIV.), was sung to the third Gregorian tone, with a refreshing change of key at the 24th verse. The "Magnificat," harmonized on the sixth Gregorian tone by Mr. Warwick Jordan, and the "Nunc dimittis," to the so-called "Parisian tone," after the arrangement of Dr. Stainer, were both very impressive; so was the anthem, for which Mendelssohn's setting of the Lutheran choral, "Now thank we all our God" (Lobgesang), did service; and so, above all, was the hymn sung during the collection of "Offertory"—Tallis's "Canon," to Bishop Kenn's verses "Glory to Thee, O God," which, whether regarded as a mere tune, or as a piece of ingenious workmanship, has scarcely been surpassed. The hymn before the sermon was again an old melody chosen from the Salisbury Hymnal; and the "Te Deum laudamus" was that which is generally known as Marbeck's "Ambrosian," constructed upon the fifth Gregorian tone.

It is but just to say that the musical performance (Mr. Helmore himself beating time to the choir) was almost unexceptionably good. Into further details we cannot enter beyond adding that the congregation did not, except when Tallis's hymn was sung, join in so often and so heartily as had doubtless been contemplated.

Prayers were intoned by the Rev. W. F. Weber, Sub-Dean and Succinctor of the Cathedral; the first lesson for the day was read by Canon Lightfoot, the second by Canon Gregory. Voluntaries were played by Dr. Stainer, organist of St. Paul's, in his well known admirable style, among other pieces being a prelude and fugue by Mendelssohn and Handel's Occasional Overture. Mr. Jordan also played a voluntary, besides accompanying the whole of the service.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—Shortly before her death, the Grand Duchess Helène, who was a great patroness of music, appointed Mdlle. Anna Regan, Court Concert Singer, and Herr Schiemann, Court Pianist.—M. Tschaikowsky's last Russian opera, Opritschniko, is accepted, and will shortly be produced. Some Stringed Quartets by the same composer have just been published by Jürgeson in Moscow.

VIENNA.—Door's Trio Soirées have afforded so much satisfaction that a general wish has been expressed for them to be repeated next year, and, indeed, to become a regular feature in the musical arrangements here.—The second concert of the Vienna Singing Academy, under Herr Weinwurm, came off in the small room of the Musical Union. The principal pieces in the bill were: "Magnificat," Durant; four English Madrigals, John Bennett, Dowland, and Thomas Morley; and Schumann's "Spanische Liebeslieder."—Professor Hoffmann has commenced a series of Wagner Lectures; but, judging from the exceedingly small audience at the first lecture, the series will not be long before it is brought to a conclusion. Wagner's dramas were not written to be read by a Professor in a black dress-coat and a white neck-tie, and, even if they were, Professor Hoffmann is not the Professor to read them.

APOLLO VERSUS BEETHOVEN.

Our friend of Harper's "Easy Chair," has enjoyed many a good symphony with us in days which we remember, and which he has glowingly described. But now the genial old gentleman seems more inclined to dance. Leaving his un-easy chair, in strange bewilderment, he wanders to the Boston Music Hall, to seek that pleasure in a classical symphony concert. Did he ever think of going to a New York "Philharmonic" for his "Blue Danube?" We fear his wits were wandering, (for verily there is no wit in his elaborate satire, at least we can find none.) Probably the mere name of symphony, by force of old association, caught his fancy as he hastened to the hall expecting a new symphony by Strauss. But "se vuol ballare Signor Contino," if his honour wants to dance, there are plenty of figaros to "sound the guitar" for him; and Gilmore can do that; why turn to a symphony concert for it? Coming out from the hall, the dear old fellow, whose sympathies of course are all with youth, becomes the confidant of some callow dancing beau, or maiden on the eve of "coming out" and sinking with a sigh into the hard old chair again, proceeds to discuss the concert from their point of view,—as if all concerts ought to be "forbidden" which are not designed exclusively for them.

He joins in the cry against "this Bach fashion," after listening to the only piece of Bach that thus far has been given this whole winter—and that a simple cradle song, a sweet and lovely melody, all melody, alike in the voice part and in each accompanying instrument. For this is the character of all Bach's music; long, flowing melodies he always has; his harmony itself is all melodious, an intertwining and embracing of melodious parts; not one melody with a tedious tum-ti-tum guitar accompaniment. Unfortunately, Bach is not in fashion here, and never was; fashion is not apt to be enamoured of anything so sound and healthy, so steadfast and enduring. Art versus fashion, the intrinsically true and beautiful versus the caprices of a shallow clique, the fashions and the whimsies of a season—that, in music, is the very end and aim of symphony or Philharmonic concerts. There is no lack of provision, even, for the lighter, miscellaneous music. Every musical showman, every speculator in public amusements, looks out for that. The only music which gets no chance amid their eager competition, unless the earnest friends thereof build up some permanent establishment for it, jealously guarding its full rights in its own proper programmes, is the so-called "classical" or model music,—the music, of whose beauty, genius, excellence there cannot be a doubt. Should that go down amid the waves and freshets of "fashion" and frivolity, where would taste find any standard? Or, rather, what would become of taste after a long miscellaneous cramming with sweetmeats and confectionery?

Our uneasy friend furnishes us with some good catchwords for texts, if we had room to enter fully into the discussion. "Melody forbidden in the music hall" is one. Surely he does not need to be told that there is melody enough in Haydn and Mozart—in their symphonies as well as in their songs. Of Bach we have already spoken. And so of all the greatest orchestral composers; every one of them is full of melody, not commonplace and sentimental, and the melody is "treated" so set and illustrated by all the means of art, that it can never become hackneyed. The gradual and sure discovery of this is one great part of the delight of those who loyally attend and listen to a series of such concerts.

Then as to "light" and "heavy" music. A good composition is like good bread; it is well risen, "light," digestible. It is because of this very excellence that the classical works please generation after generation of those whose appetites have not been cloyed and spoiled by sweetmeats, and the heavy cake and hot bread that are as lead upon the stomach. "Heavy music!" Is there anything so heavy as some of the new music with which the craving after novelty has tantalized itself of late?

How many "symphonic poems" would it take to make one a confirmed musical dyspeptic? Now, what these monstrous, huge-effect pieces of Liszt and Berlioz do in one way, is done in another way by all these miscellaneous feasts and crammings of so-called light and brilliant music. What so fatiguing as a programme without tone or plan, without consistency or symmetry, where each thing that we hear wipes out the whole impression of the last, and we are haunted afterwards only by scraps of melody out of a bewildering Babel and confusion of tongues?

But really our Howadji's brain is getting morbid, mystical, deranged, when he begins to rave about a "rod of iron" and the "inquisition" and the trembling worship of the "brazen giant," meaning Crawford's Beethoven, who stands there just as much a type of the eternal youth of genius, as the Apollo at the opposite end of the hall. We will not attempt to follow him and reason with him in those wild hallucinations, It must be that there was some juvenile roguery in those young friends of his, and that they stuffed his chair full of pins; for he talks like one awaking from bad dreams.

When he summonses "Apollo," however, as an antidote to his grim tyrant, Beethoven, and to the dreadful name (for it is name alone) of Bach, we are tempted to suggest that, if Apollo be the god of Poetry and Art, the genius of immortal youth, where will he find more true and splendid homage than in the music of the mighty master? And, looking from one statue to the other while the symphony goes on, who can help feeling that between those two, at least, there must be perfect sympathy and understanding? JOHN S. DWIGHT.

THE MENDELSSOHN SCHOLARSHIP.

It may literally be news to many readers, that we have in England an institution consecrated to the memory of Mendelssohn, and to the good of the art he adorned. Musical scholarships are plentiful in countries less devoted than our own to the pursuit of material wealth, or more gifted with a love of artistic culture, but here the existence of one endowment is legitimately a matter for surprise. It is a fact, nevertheless, that England possesses a single musical scholarship—a "little ewe lamb"—on behalf of which some gentlemen who brought it up "by hand" have lately issued an appeal. Sir Julius Benedict, Sir Sterndale Bennett, Sir John Goss, Sir F. G. Ouseley, Messrs. Benecke, Davison, Hallé, Hullah, Leslie, Sullivan, Pye, Pym, and Goldschmidt, are the nursing fathers of this unique institution, and to them we are indebted for such a sketch of its history as must bring a blush of shame to the face of every English reader. One outcome of the regret occasioned by Mendelssohn's early death in 1847, was a proposal to establish scholarships connected with the Leipsic Conservatoire, which he had helped to found. A London committee, with the late Sir George Smart at its head, was formed to aid this scheme; and in 1848, Mdme. Jenny Lind, ever ready to do good works, suggested a special performance of Elijah, and tendered her powerful assistance. The suggestion was so acted upon, that, adding the profits of the performance to a few donations previously made, the committee found themselves in possession of "£1,050 Bank Three Per Cent. Annuities." With this miserable sum nothing worth doing could be done at the time, and the English committee, representing the nation which most warmly admired Mendelssohn, were forced to separate themselves from the Leipsic scheme, and allow their funds to accumulate. Compound interest slowly did the work of public spirit, and in 1856—nine years having passed since the starting of their enterprise—the committee were able to elect a scholar in the person of Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan, then one of the boys of Her Majesty's Chapel Royal. Mr. Sullivan enjoyed the scholarship for four years, and made good use of it; but only in 1865 was it practicable to give him a successor. The second choice fell upon Mr. (now Dr.) C. S. Heap, who was followed in 1871, by Mr. W. Shakespeare, the present incumbent. We have thus a grand total of three musicians educated by twenty-four years' subscriptions to the honour of Mendelssohn and the good of art. It is true that when Mr. Shakespeare was elected, the committee, animated by an excess of faith, established two minor scholarships of £20 at the Royal Academy of Music. But they now say that these must be abandoned, and that not even one scholar can be supplied with all his requirements out of the proceeds of £1,350 Five per Cent. India Stock. Under these circumstances, they appeal to the generosity of a music-loving public, and to the patriotism of all who are jealous for the good name of England. Surely they will not appeal in vain, especially when it is said that the competitions already held have shown the existence of remarkable talent running to waste, because no means exist of utilizing it. We cannot afford this state of things. Too long has musical ability been repressed for the want of a little help at the outset; and far too long has England held the lowest place among civilized nations in respect of the art upon which, for the gratification it affords, she spends money with such a lavish hand. To check the waste of talent and to remove a grave reproach, we hope that the appeal of the Mendelssohn Scholarship Committee will prove a success.

DRESDEN.—From the 1st January to the 31st December, 1872, the Theatre Royal was open 339 evenings. Among the 189 different pieces performed were 41 operas, 5 musical burlettas, 1 Festival Piece (to celebrate the "Golden Wedding" of the King and Queen), and 1 ballet. The last two compositions, and 2 operas, were novelties; 10 operas, operettas, and musical burlettas were revivals.—The series of concerts given by Herr Mannsfeld are very well attended. Among the more important novelties produced at them lately may be mentioned a new Violin Concerto, composed by Herr R. Becker, and played by Herr Felix Meyer. The programmes also included at first the "Ride of the Walkyres" ("Walkürenritt"), from Herr R. Wagner's Walkire, but this piece has now been withdrawn by an edict from the Poet-Musician of the Future "who regrets," etc., but "cannot allow Herr Mannsfeld," etc., as "he never permits anyone," etc.

MUSIC IN SYDNEY.

Lyster's English opera season proved a decided success, and the Theatre Royal was crowded on the last night, when the impresario took his benefit—Der Freischütz being the opera selected, Miss Alice May sustaining, of course, the part of Agatha. The Italian company, under Cagli, have not met with much success in New Zealand, and are about to leave for Melbourne.

The pantomime here is drawing crowded houses, and other places of entertainment are doing pretty well. The most remarkable of these is Miss Alice May's Gallery of Illustration (à la German Reed), of which the local press speaks in high terms. Miss May's versatility is most remarkable, and she has appeared in the course of a few days in grand opera, oratorio, comic opera, and burlesque. In the latter, she is almost without a rival. She is well supported in her new entertainment, (or "show," as it is called here,) and her present programme contains Offenbach's Rose of Auvergne, Sullivan's Cox and Box, and the burlesque, The Belle of Wooloomooloo, with new verses by Grosvenor Bunster (of the Sydney Punch), the music composed and arranged by Mr. G. B. Allen. His Excellency the Governor and Lady Robinson have taken it under their special patronage, and Commodore Stirling, and the officers of H.M.S. Clio, are to be present on Tuesday next. There is a rumour of a probable visit from la Reine des pianistes, Arabella Goddard! What a charming prospect for the real lovers of music! but what a prospect for the lady herself? There are not more than about three towns in Victoria—Melbourne, Ballarat, and Bendigo; one in New South Wales—Sydney; one in South Australia—Adelaide; and one in Queensland—Brisbane, where it would be positively worth while giving a concert; and those colonies are about 500 miles apart—that is two or three days sailing. I fear there will be no commensurate return for the fatigue and expense undergone. If she does come, the Argus will possibly repeat a phrase it used on the arrival of Mr. G. B. Allen: "A distinguished artist has arrived amongst us—so much the better for Australia; so much the worse for the individual himself." Of one thing Arabella Goddard may be assured, that if she does come, her welcome, and especially by the Melbourne people, will be of the warmest character.

MUSIC IN MARGATE.

Mrs. Frances Talfourd's fifth annual concert, in aid of the Alexandra Homes, took place on Tuesday week, and was exceedingly well attended, the large Assembly Room being crammed from end to end. On these occasions Mrs. Talfourd never fails to help the cause of charity by offering an entertainment thoroughly deserving of support by reason of its own merits; and it would indeed be something to wonder at were the Margate people to fail of a hearty response to her invitation. The programme which delighted the audience last week comprised a great variety of selections, the more prominent and successful of which we will specify, premising that the fair and benevolent concert-giver took a prominent part in the concerted music, and, also, sang Gounod's "O, that we two were Maying" with such refinement and expression as to secure a unanimous recall. Mdme. Demeric Lablache was very successful in "Ah! mon fils" (La Prophète), having to bow her acknowledgments three times. She also made a decided "hit" with Randegger's pretty berceuse, "Sleep, dearest sleep." Mdme. Thaddeus Wells was recalled after Ganz's "Sweet bird;" and Signor Caravoglia—a great favourite in Margate—was called upon to repeat both Barri's "Di perche" and Rossini's "I miei rampolli." The solo pianist was Signor Tito Mattei, whose brilliant execution appeared to great advantage in several of his own pieces, which were encored. Mr. Croft and Mr. Bernard Lane did good service as vocalists, and the accompaniments were safe in the hands of Mr. J. L. Hatton. The result of the concert will be a considerable addition to the funds of a deserving charity.

MILAN.—The first representation of Señor Gomez's new opera, Fosca, was to have taken place on the 15th inst.; but, of course, some one was taken ill, and the production of the opera had to be deferred. On this occasion, Signora Krauss was the interesting invalid.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From our Correspondent.)

A concert, followed by a ball, was given on Thursday evening last, at the Etablissement, for the benefit of the "Orphans and deserted children of Boulogne." It was under distinguished patronage; while a committee, composed mostly of English gentlemen, undertook the management; the well known Mr. Merridew acting as treasurer, and M. Spiers, the enterprising and obliging Managing Director of the Etablissement, as secretary. And now for a glance at the programme. The Orpheons, whose performances I have noticed several times before in your columns, sang with their usual good taste, but there was a "dearth" of tenors. They sang a "Nocturne," by Denefoe (the audience at M. Reichardt's late concert having been so pleased with it that it was given, "by express desire," on the present occasion,); a valse by Zollner; and supported the amateurs in "La Prière de Moïse." In this last piece the dearth of tenors was most manifest, as the gentlemen were chiefly basses, and the lady amateurs only numbered fifteen.

More native talent was displayed in a duo from the Reine de Chypre, sung by M. Devilliers and M. Outrau, and deservedly applauded; also in two violin performances by M. Goudroy (fantasias on airs from Robert le Diable and La Juive.) Before quitting the subject of "native worth," let me mention, with especial praise, the name of M. Devilliers, a pupil of M. Rubini. Possessed of a sweet tenor voice, of good compass, he sings with accuracy; and, although he has been a short time only under his able instructor, he has made great progress. Of course, he has at present much to learn, but I am very sanguine about the future of this zealous young artist. The first piece M. Devilliers sang was a "Ballade de Rigoletto," otherwise, "La donna e Mobile;" the second being a French song, "L'Incensé;" both were enthusiastically received.

In the way of professional talent we had Mdlle. Holmberg and the Chevalier de Kontaki. The lady—well known in Paris concert circles, and quite lately as a débutante at the opera in Brussells, for her rich soprano voice—sang an air from La Reine de Saba, "Plus grand dans son obscurite," and also took a prominent part in the quartet from Rigoletto. In both she displayed a fine method of singing. The said quartet (sung by Mdlle. Holmberg, Mdlle. Bohren, MM. Outrau and Devilliers), was the best performance of the evening. The Chevalier de Kontaki played a fantasia and air from Dinorah and a composition of his own.

The ball which followed was unusually brilliant and well attended, and was kept up till three a.m.

The result, financially, for the poor orphans and enfants abandonnés, was, after all expenses paid, a sum of £125. S.C.

SOME CONTRADICTIONS.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—As Ali Baba is one of the weakest of Cherubini's orchestral preludes, so is the Abencerrages one of the strongest—his very best, perhaps, and most individually characteristic. It is worthy of note that both operas were comparatively failures, the one (the Abencerrages) so highly praised, and the other, Cherubini's last dramatic work, for certain alleged faults, so severely criticised by Mendelssohn. Quid tum postea?—Yours obediently, THEOPHILUS WIND, (M.D.)

HAYDN AND SCHUBERT.

DEAR THADDEUS EGG,—Please recall the charge of "sneering" which you have made on me. It is a thing which I never did, and I hope never shall do—quite foreign to my nature. And even if it were my line, I should as soon think of sneering at Haydn as at York Minster or the Archbishop of Canterbury. As to my respect and admiration of him, I hope no one need doubt who reads my attempts to analyze his symphonies in many a Crystal Palace programme. But you surely will allow that, with his wonderful liveliness and freshness, there are now and then some old-fashioned phrases; and all that I meant was that in the Finale to No. 5 Symphony, Schubert had embodied one or two of them. The score is at Manchester with Mr. Charles Hallé or I would quote the passages I referred to.—Yours very truly,

Feb. 17, 1873. G. GROVE.

The Musical World.
LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 1, 1873.

IN the course of an article upon the suit brought by Mr. C. Reade against the Morning Advertiser, our friend, the Liverpool Porcupine, whose pen is as sharp as his quills, moralised in the terms following:—

"But the serious question as to this trial and its regretable result amounts to this: are critics, when sent to theatres, to report on what they hear and see, to write honestly, or to 'cook' their criticisms in order to avoid the pitfalls of the disgracefully elastic law of libel? If it comes to 'cooking,' both the public and the theatres will be sure to suffer in the long run, and we shall constantly find our playhouses filled by incompetent artistes playing in bad pieces. Talent, either dramatic or literary, will receive neither recognition nor encouragement. Newspaper proprietors are not all wealthy, and all newspapers are not as powerful as the Times or Saturday Review; and, for the sake of saving their pockets, not to speak of their peace of mind and comfort, editors will 'cut' theatres altogether, sooner than be at the mercy of any dreary actor or author who can pay a respectable attorney or secure the services of those legal pests who 'take up cases.'"

There is a good deal in these few lines; and, beyond question, some change will have to be made in the relations of authors and critics, or, if not, a change such as that the Porcupine foreshadows will make itself. But our object in referring to the matter is not to speculate upon reforms in the law of libel, as specially affecting those whose public position makes them public conservators of all that is good in art. We wish rather to call attention to the state of public criticism within those limits which the law of libel, be it ever so strained, cannot reach. Premising that our remarks apply wholly to the criticism of things musical, we say that here, also, the same "ignorant impatience" of censure is manifested. We advisedly use the expression quoted from Mr. Disraeli; because that impatience of censure must be ignorant which wholly mistakes the functions of the censurer. A critic, if he really be a critic, is something more than a reporter commissioned to inform an anxious world that Mdme. So-and-so was encored in "She wore a wreath of roses," or that Monsieur Quelquechose wielded the bâton with characteristic energy. Such news may be important to the public, as well as to Madame and Monsieur; but the critic has a higher function to perform than the retailing it. He is the guardian of the interests of art and of the public; and it is his imperative duty to condemn everything that, in his judgment, militates against either. He must do this, if he would be faithful, without fear, without suppression on the one hand, or exaggeration on the other, and without reference to the vastly minor interests of individuals. Of course, we know that this is an ideal, and that, in practice, a thousand things hinder the most earnest critic from reaching it; but none the less should it be striven after, and every advance towards it be regarded as a triumph. A great many interested people completely fail to see this, self-conceit having reduced them to a condition of moral blindness. They act as though no such thing as criticism were involved in the matter—as though the press were an institution founded for nothing but the trumpeting of their praises. Even when praised they are not pleased; there is always some "little rift within the lute," which spoils the harmony of the song to their exacting ears. To use a common term, the butter of laudation must be "laid on" very thick indeed to give them even approximate satisfaction. Blame they cannot understand at all. It means personal insult, demanding personal revenge, and only those who are behind the scenes have any idea of the various forms in which revenge is sought. Anonymous letters and backstairs influences often supplement avowed hostility in the effort to discredit the man who has performed a public duty, without reference to private considerations. Instances sometimes occur, no doubt, where private ill-will prompts public attacks; but the critic, in such cases, is speedily found out, and judged at his true worth. When, on the contrary, the critic acts honestly, according to the light that is in him, the state of things is very bad which makes him the victim of persecution, and he has a claim not merely on the sympathy, but also on the support of all who set store by the well-being of art. The time may soon come when those with whom criticism deals will more often find the absolute truth told. In that case, they will, perhaps, grow hardened to a phenomenon which now excites the panic natural to men who see the hateful and inexplicable rolled into one.

MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD'S FAREWELL.

(From "The Morning Post.")

The retirement of an artist from the scene of former successes is in effect like the loss of a familiar friend. Madame Arabella Goddard has retired from English public life, and takes with her the hearts of all those she has made happy by the excitement of many new pleasures. But for her the more ambitious of the compositions of writers for the pianoforte would probably have yet remained uninterpreted; but through her ability, skill, and high art-promptings, those works, which by their almost insurmountable difficulties were sealed to the many, have been made permanently familiar. She will be most missed when others play the works so thoroughly identified with her name and style; and the purity of her reading, brilliant and faultless manipulation, perfect control of the resources of her instrument, and thousand and one other matters that made her performances attractive, may be looked for in vain from the hands of those who will be called upon to fill, but not to occupy, her place. Artists loved to hear her play, to sit at her feet and learn, and if in the eagerness of a desire to find an imaginative conception realized, the mind at times longed for a more ardent interpretation, none dared in honour to call into question the beauty and symmetry of the realization. But this is all gone, for us it is matter of history; and the fair artist, who for twenty years has been at the highest point in her profession, now descends that others may climb, if they will and can. In the very zenith of her fame, in the full enjoyment of youthful years, she leaves the artistic world on this side of the globe to seek fresh fields and pastures new in the Antipodes. With hearty wishes and hopes for the full and complete success she deserves, and has so nobly won, we take leave with a keen regret of one who has done so much to make the English name stand high in the artistic world.

(From the "Observer," Feb. 16, 1873.)

On Tuesday last a star of the first magnitude disappeared from our musical firmament. The great pianist who has delighted us for twenty years, and whose fame—as the representative instrumentalist of Great Britian—is spread throughout the civilized world, took her farewell of her English admirers, and will shortly start on a lengthened tour round the world. It seems hard to part with her when in the full maturity of her powers and at the zenith of her fame, and we look in vain for a successor competent to fill up the void which will be made by her disappearance. The enthusiastic plaudits with which she was greeted last Tuesday by the brilliant throng which crowded St. James's Hall were expressive of that admiration of her genius, and regret at her departure, which are felt by the entire nation. Madame Goddard was worthily assisted by Mr. Santley, Mr. Lloyd, M.M. Carrodus, Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti, and Sir Julius Benedict. Her own contributions to the programme were the famous "Ne plus ultra" sonata by Woelfl, the accompaniment to "Adelaida," and the pianoforte parts to Mendelssohn's D minor Sonata (for pianoforte and violoncello), and Haydn's trio in G major. Her playing throughout the concert was distinguished by the power, delicacy, facility, expression, and refinement which, alternately or together, form the delight of her hearers; and the apparent ease with which the most formidable difficulties were surmounted lent an additional charm. Cheers and bouquets were of course, abundant, and at the end of the concert Madame Goddard was recalled again and again to receive the affectionate farewell greetings of her admirers. We cannot entirely relinquish the hope of hearing her again after her circumnavigation of the world; and in that hope we borrow a motto from one of the works of that Mendelssohn of whom she was so eloquent an exponent, and wish a "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" to Arabella Goddard.

(From the "Shipping Gazette," Feb. 13, 1873.)

This distinguished pianist played for the last time, on Tuesday night, at St. James's Hall. It appears that she intends, as other artists of eminence have done before her, to leave England for a lengthened tour in Australia and other outlying countries; so that, for some time to come, at all events, those who have listened to her for the past twenty years, and have learnt to know and appreciate the remarkable excellence of her ability, will, unfortunately, hear her no more. Few have laboured more assiduously than this lady in vindicating the higher claims of the instrument over which she has exercised such extraordinary supremacy, and none have exhibited so unimpeachable a proficiency in the power of illustrating every variety of style, from Beethoven downwards; while the explorations she has from time to time made among the forgotten works of bygone writers will always identify her in a peculiarly honourable manner with the present history of the pianoforte. A pupil of Kalkbrenner and Thalberg, she has had scarcely a compeer in those mechanical attainments which uniformly command public applause; but in her case her playing was invariably influenced by all the intellectual subtleties proper to the occasion; and whether it was Beethoven or Mozart, Weber or Mendelssohn, Dussek or Woelfl, or the sensational productions of a more modern period, neither her hand nor her intelligence ever wearied or faltered. The music was given without wrong or reproach, and with the fullest development of its æsthetic worth, if it had any. The announcement of the retirement of this gifted lady naturally brought together a large audience at St. James's Hall; and, among the many visitors, most of the well-known faces of the leading professional musicians now in the metropolis might be discerned. The reception given to her, and the plaudits that awaited her at the termination of the concert, may easily be imagined. A more enthusiastic display of real and genuine feeling was never witnessed; and it could hardly have been otherwise, for the magnificent way in which she had just played the "Ne Plus Ultra" of Woelfl, Mendelssohn's sonata (with violoncello) in D, and the pianoforte part in Haydn's trio in G, showed but too clearly that an artist was lost to the English concert-room, who, it could hardly be hoped, would ever be replaced. In these valedictory performances of Madame Goddard was of course centred the principal interest of the evening, but the singing of Mr. Santley and Mr. Edward Lloyd—the latter acting as a substitute for Mr. Sims Reeves, and who gave a tender and impassioned version of "Adelaida" to the superlatively fine accompaniment of Madame Goddard—was highly attractive, and enriched the programme most agreeably.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

A CIRCUMSTANCE lately took place in the theatre of Guayaquil, which gives, or at least is intended to give, a high idea of the extreme sensitiveness of the authorities and guardians of public morality in that well-governed country, the republic of Ecuador. A French lyrical company lately introduced into their programme, for the delectation and amusement of the theatre-going people of Guayaquil, Offenbach's La Grande Duchesse. During the second act, where the Grand Duchess shows herself very familiar with Fritz, the chief authority of the city, who was present, immediately rose up from his seat and ordered the piece to go no further, as being insulting to the morality and dignity of the Guayaquil public, and stopped accordingly it was.

Le Ménestrel publishes two anecdotes of M. Gounod, which require neither note nor comment. According to one, the composer of Faust, after hearing the Choral Symphony at the Conservatoire, exclaimed, "It is the Bible of the musician!" According to the other, the composer of the Messe Solennelle, in the course of a musical discussion, said, "If the works of the greatest masters, Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, were annihilated by a cataclysm, as the greatest paintings might be by a fire, it would be easy to re-make them all out of the music of Bach. In the heaven of art, Bach is a nebula which is not yet condensed."

THE first of Mr. Henry Leslie's series of subscription concerts took place in St. James's Hall, on Thursday night. There was a varied and interesting programme, and the concert, of which we shall speak at length in our next number, was a genuine success. Among the audience was H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh.

DARMSTADT.—According to carefully prepared estimates, the rebuilding of the Theatre will not cost more than 450,000 florins over and above the sum paid by the insurance offices.

LEIPSIC.—According to report, the Second Part of Goethe's Faust, with H. Pierson's music, will be performed ere long at the Stadtheater.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

The first concert of the seventh season of the Schubert Society took place on Wednesday, 19th February. The first part of the programme, according to the rules, being devoted to Franz Schubert's compositions, including the Grand Trio in E flat, played by Mdlle. Zellner, Herr Mayrhofer, and Herr Schuberth; and a solo for violoncello. The vocal pieces were "Der Neugierige," "Heideroeslein," "Die Post," sung by Mdme. Schulz; "Der Wanderer," Miss Kinnair; and a song by Mr. H. C. Sanders. The second part was miscellaneous, opening with Chopin's Grand Polonaise for piano and violoncello, played by Mdlle. Zellner and Herr Schuberth, which was re-demanded; but no encores being allowed, was not responded to. The other instrumental pieces were, solo violin, "Le Streghi" (Paganini), Herr Mayrhofer; solo pianoforte, Mdlle. Zellner; and solo violoncello, a new Romance, Herr Schuberth. Amongst the vocal pieces, the new compositions produced were, a new ballad (Dressl), sung by Mdlle. Schulz, accompanied by the composer; and a new song by Mdme. Habicht, sung by Miss Kinnair, and very much applauded. Mr. Sanders sang Pinsuti's song, "The Raft," and Herr Schuberth conducted. The rooms were very full, and the programme is to be repeated at an extra concert, owing to the desire expressed by several members who could not obtain tickets for their friends on the present occasion. The second concert will take place on Wednesday, April 2nd.

An evening concert took place in the Royal Artillery Recreation Rooms, Woolwich, in aid of the Regimental Charities, a short time since, and was attended with brilliant success. The following distinguished professional and amateur artists interpreted a programme of unusual excellence, viz: Miss Kemlo Stephen, Miss Helen D'Alton, (who secured a rapturous reception for Signor Edoardo Barri's beautiful song entitled "Mizpah"); Miss Florence Ashton, and Mademoiselle Victoria Bundsen, two highly accomplished contraltos, Major Goodenough, R.A., Colonel Stracey, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, Mr. Wallace Carpenter, Mr. W. C. Harrington Mitchell, and Signor Foli. Signor Edoardo Barri and Herr Reyloff were the pianists, and the Orchestral Band of the Royal Artillery, under the bâton of its talented conductor, Mr. J. Smythe was also a prominent feature in the instrumental department.

Mr. Edward Compton, son of the veteran comedian, assisted by Miss Florence Ashton, the rising young contralto, Mr. Wilkinson and Miss Compton, (pianists), gave an entertainment of music and recitations, on Wednesday evening, February 19th, at the Victoria Hall, Archer Street, Bayswater. There was a large and fashionable audience, and the applause was of an enthusiastic nature.

A concert was given at the Birkbeck Institution, Holborn, February 22nd, which, notwithstanding a wet evening, attracted a very large audience. The Misses Watson, Campbell, and Stevenson; Messrs. Ryle, Rendle, and C. J. Bishenden, were the principal performers. Among the most pleasing songs of the evening were those of the Misses Watson and Campbell. A perfect storm of applause greeted Mr. Bishenden on his appearance; and that gentleman won an enthusiastic encore for his rendering of "The Wolf," and replied by singing "The Friar of Orders Gray." Mr. Salzman was the leader of a band of about twenty violins, which gave great pleasure in their selections.

PROVINCIAL.

Malvern—(From a Correspondent).—On Monday evening the members of the Malvern Link Choral Union gave a concert in aid of funds for the widows and orphans, caused by the loss of the "Northfleet." Mr. Parsons, of the Link Hotel, kindly placed his assembly room at their disposal. In spite of the inclement night, the room was filled with a fashionable audience. Mr. Pugh, of the Worcester Cathedral Choir, sang, with his accustomed ability, "Tom Bowling," "Poor Ned," and "The Anchor's Weigh'd;" besides assisting in the duet, "All's Well." The gem of the evening was the "Northfleet," written for the occasion by Mrs. Eliza F. Morris, and set to music by Mr. Philip Klitz, the conductor of the Choral Union; both of whom had done their allotted task most admirably. The programme was a "nautical" one, the songs, &c., being, "Rule Britannia," "Depths of the Ocean," "The Sailor's Funeral" (Klitz), "The Pilot," "All's Well," "Echoes of the Sea," "The Death of Nelson," "The Northfleet" (Klitz), "Hurrah for the Sea" (Klitz), "The Storm," "To all you Ladies;" Concertina Solo, with variations on an "Old English Melody" (Klitz); and "Rolling home across the sea." Several of these were encored; and a most enjoyable evening was spent, the concert concluding with the National Anthem. M. Klitz presided at the piano with considerable ability. The attendance would have been larger had the evening been more favourable; but with snow inches deep on the ground, it requires extra courage to leave a snug and comfortable fireside.

Dundee.—During Madame Helena Walker's tour in Scotland, Handel's oratorio, Jephtha, was performed for the first time here, on Tuesday evening, the 11th inst. In noticing the performance, the Dundee Advertiser writes:—

"Madame Helena Walker sung as if she knew this old and long-forgotten work. She proved herself on this occasion a good artist, possessing a charming style of singing and great capacity of expression. Her recitatives were remarkably well delivered, for she read them with exhaustive care. Not less admirable was her treatment of the air, 'The Smiling Dawn,' given with a buoyancy of style perfectly in keeping with the dramatic situation. When sore grief comes to Iphis, in the third part of the work, her style of singing was then as well in keeping therewith. She carefully avoided all personal display. The first section of the grand air, 'Farewell, ye limpid springs,' was as fine a piece of truthful expression as we ever expect to hear."

Dublin.—Miss Lucy Franklein has had great success with the English opera company here. We extract the following from the Irish Times:—

"Miss Lucy Franklein is a contralto far beyond the ordinary standard, one of the best, indeed we have yet heard in English opera. Her voice is rich and resonant, bright and clear in the upper, and telling in the lower, register. What is equally in her favour is her good and unaffected style. The company, which includes Miss Blanche Cole, Mr. Castle, Mr. Nordblom, &c., is a first-rate one, and the lessees are rewarded by crowded houses every evening."

Swindon.—A pianoforte and vocal recital was given by Mrs. John Macfarren on Wednesday, February 12th, forming one of a series of performances, under the auspices of the directors of the Great Western Railway. The accomplished pianist delighted an audience, that filled every part of the commodious Lecture Hall, by her masterly playing of a brilliant selection of pieces by Beethoven, Mozart, Hummel, Litolff, &c. She was greatly applauded throughout the evening, and was obliged to repeat Brissac's Welsh Fantasia. Miss Jessie Royd was encored in Mr. G. A. Macfarren's pretty ballad, "Somebody;" and, with Signor Bellini, a portion of Ricci's animated duet from Crispino e la Comare was given with great spirit.

St. Ives.—We find the following in the Cambridge Independent Press:—

"On Thursday, the second of the 'Subscription' concerts for this season was held in the Corn Exchange. Madame Thaddeus Wells (soprano) and Mr. Henry Nicholson, the eminent flautist, made their first appearance here, and it was evident, from the reception they received, that on any future occasion they will gain a hearty welcome. Madame Wells quite delighted the audience by her exquisite rendering of 'Kathleen Mavourneen,' and 'Lo, hear the gentle lark,' the latter with flute obliggato by Mr. Nicholson. The flute solo, 'Rule Britannia,' by this gentleman, was brilliantly executed, and met with a rapturous encore. The singing of Miss Waldock, in 'The beating of my own heart,' and 'May dew,' also in the duet, 'Smile once again, sweet love,' was much admired and deservedly applauded. It is almost needless to say the pianoforte playing of Mrs. Holloway was excellent. The various trios and quartets were also fairly rendered. The orchestral band performed exceedingly well. The whole was under the able conductorship of Mr. Holloway. The attendance was not so large as had been anticipated, owing, no doubt, in a great measure, to the unpropitious state of the weather."

Southampton.—Mrs. John Macfarren gave a concert in the Hartley Hall, on Wednesday evening, Feb. 19, (in connection with the Polytechnic Institution,) assisted by Miss Agnes Drummond and Miss Alice Barnett as vocalists. There was a very full attendance. The pianoforte solos of Mrs. Macfarren were indeed fine specimens of executive skill, and were played with an amount of expression and taste, that indicated a thorough love for, and a perfect acquaintance with the musical art. The singing of Miss Drummond and Miss Barnett was excellent; and though encores were forbidden in the first part, such a restraint could not be put upon the audience in the second. The applause was constant and hearty, particularly when Miss Agnes Drummond favoured the audience with the fine old ballad, "There's nae luck about the house," in a style which delighted all present.

Hamburgh.—Herr Joachim recently appeared at a concert here, and played Handel's Sonata for Violin, Beethoven's Romance, and Schumann's "Abendlied." How he played them, it is superfluous to say. Several choruses by Gesius, Scandellus, and Mozart, and 3 choruses for female voices, by Brahms, were sung under the direction of Herr Ad. Schulze, from Berlin.—The programme of the fifth Philharmonic Concert comprised Berlioz's "Harold Symphony," Schubert's "Rosamund Music," and Mozart's Symphony in G minor.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

This week's concert commenced with Mendelssohn's Quintet in A major, which was given for the sixth time here—the second portion of the programme having been opened by a Quartet of Haydn's that had not previously been heard at these concerts. This work—in the key of G major, and classed as Op. 17, No. 5—although not among the finest of the long series (83), is far from being among the least beautiful. The quaint grace of the first movement, the vivacity of the finale, and the calm stateliness of the minuet, pleased greatly; while the serious tone of the adagio stood in strong contrast thereto, and produced a still greater impression. The incidental use of the form of recitative for the first violin in this movement would seem to prove that Haydn was acquainted with others of the instrumental works of Bach besides his Wohltemperirte Clavier. The adagio, judging from the applause which it received, would gladly have been heard again. That the Quintet and Quartet were admirably played throughout may be inferred from the fact that Herr Joachim was supported in the latter by Mr. L. Ries, Herr Straus, and Signor Piatti, and in the former by the same, with the addition of Mr. Zerbini, who also officiated as accompanist at the pianoforte. The vocal music introduced, for the first time, a Russian lady, Madame Lavrowska, who obtained a special success by the charm of her voice and the refinement of her style. In Beethoven's arietta, "In questa tomba," and Handel's air, "Tutta raccolta ancor," the sympathetic quality of tone and the genuine pathos of expression displayed by the singer were such as to call forth marked and general applause. In an elaborate scena from Glinka's Russian opera, Tizne na Tzaria (Life for the Czar), Madame Lavrowska displayed dramatic power of a high order. Her declamation in the opening recitative, her pathos in the intermediate andante, and the impulse and energy imparted to the closing allegro, were alike admirable, and confirmed a great and genuine success.

Madame Schumann re-appeared at Monday's concert, and was received with a greeting as warm as that which welcomed her first appearance here for the season—already recorded. On the occasion now referred to, the great pianist played, as her solo, Schubert's Fantasie-Sonata in G, and was associated with Herr Joachim in Beethoven's Duet Sonata in D (from Op. 12). On the excellence of such performances it is superfluous now to expatiate.

Notwithstanding the frost and snow there was a large attendance.

CRYSTAL PALACE NATIONAL MUSIC MEETINGS.

On Tuesday afternoon, Feb. 25th, the splendid trophy, value £1,000, won in July last by the South Wales Choral Union at the first of the annual series of national music meetings established by the Directors of the Crystal Palace Company, was publicly presented to the successful competitors, represented by (among others), Mr. Henry Richard, M.P., Colonel Stuart, M.P., Mr. Dillwyn, M.P., Mr. Fothergill, M.P., the Rev. Canon Jenkins, the Rev. Dr. Price, Mr. William Downing Evans, Mr. Brinley Richards, and Mr. Griffith Jones. It may be remembered that, although ample notice of the musical meeting was given, the Union, with a selected choir of 350 voices, alone presented itself in the competition, and that the judges—viz., Sir William Sterndale Bennett, Mr. Hullah, and Mr. Brinley Richards—unanimously decided, after a full and complete trial, that it was worthy of the prize. The Union, therefore, holds it until July next, when the trophy will be again competed for. The prize, in the shape of a gold loving-cup, formed on the model of the cups in possession of the ancient civic companies, and of that at Pembroke College, Oxford, is, with cover and stand, exactly three feet in height. It is musical in design, containing in the various niches statuettes of the Psalmist, St. Cecilia, Guido d'Arezzo, Palestrina, Handel, and Mozart. Around the base the words of the 150th Psalm are inscribed. Spaces are left for the insertion of the names of the choral societies who may be fortunate enough to win it. The cup was designed by Mr. S. J. Nicholls, architect, who secured, among a number of competitors, the award of Sir Digby Wyatt and Professor Poynter, A.R.A.; and it was executed by Messrs. Cox. The presentation to the Union was made on behalf of the Palace Company—donors of the prize—by Mr. Thomas Hughes, M.P., chairman, and the ceremony was held in front of the Handel orchestra, in presence of a great many visitors.

BRESLAU.—A grand monster concert was lately given by the Musikverband, assisted by the Singing Academy and a number of distinguished amateurs. The pianist was Mdlle. Martha Remmert; the conductors were Herr Bernhard Scholz and Dr. Julius Schüffer. The programme included Overture to Euryanthe, C. M. von Weber; Pianoforte Concerto, in E flat major, F. Liszt; Symphony in C minor, Beethoven; and Die erste Walpurgisnacht, Mendelssohn. After the concert, Dr. Schüffer was admitted an honorary member of the Verband.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

On Wednesday night there was a performance of Handel's Messiah, by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Barnby. The vocal choir and band of instrumentalists (with Mr. Pollitzer as principal violinist,) occupied the vast orchestra from floor to roof. The hall was crammed in every part, from area to picture-gallery—which was not surprising, the occasion being an Ash Wednesday performance of Handel's immortal masterpiece. Among the audience were the Prince and Princess of Wales, and other illustrious personages, the Royal box being entirely filled.

The performance generally was excellent, both in the choral and orchestral departments, the conducting of Mr. Barnby being steady and musician-like throughout, and, especially as regards the tempi, as the phrase is, thoroughly Handelian—which means in accordance with the accepted traditions. All the grand choruses made their accustomed effect; and among them we may particularly point to "For unto us a child is born," which the audience, unanimously applauding, would willingly have heard again. But Mr. Barnby, with a discretion that might with advantage be more frequently exercised, resisted the demand; and, in spite of the continuous plaudits, went on with the "Pastoral Symphony"—that transparent and tuneful orchestral prelude, during a memorable performance of which, long passed into received tradition, George III. declared he could "see the stars shining." That even the impression created by this wonderful chorus was surpassed by the incomparable "Hallelujah," to which, like the same George, the whole audience spontaneously stood up, need scarcely be added. But to enter further into details about the choral magnificence of the Messiah, which so gloriously culminates in "Worthy is the Lamb," with its overwhelming "Amen," would be superfluous. There is, as our musical readers must be aware, no oratorio more familiar, and no oratorio more universally appreciated. A solemn performance of the Messiah, in truth, has been long regarded almost in the light of an act of public worship.

The solo singers were, without exception, equal to their tasks. How Miss Edith Wynne, our admirable English soprano, sings "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and other portions of the music that fall to her share, need not be told; nor is it requisite to say how Madame Patey, legitimate successor of Madame Sainton-Dolby, in oratorio the greatest of all our English contraltos, sings the most pathetic and impressive of airs, "He was despised." Enough that both were in their best vein, and successful accordingly. The second soprano was Miss Spiller (late of the Royal Academy of Music), who proved a worthy associate to Madame Patey in "Come unto Him"—the second verse of that divinely beautiful air, "Who shall feed His flock." The tenor was Mr. Edward Lloyd, one of the most promising of our young singers, who gave the consoling air, "Comfort ye, my people," with true devotional feeling. The bass was Signor Foli, of whom it will suffice to say that he sang his very best, and was especially applauded in the bravura air, "Why do the nations so furiously rage together?"

The performance altogether was genuinely successful; and no little credit is due to the zealous and able superintendence of Mr. Barnby. The next oratorio announced to be performed at the Royal Albert Hall is Handel's Israel in Egypt, with the additional accompaniments of Mr. G. A. Macfarren.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

A Students' Concert took place on Thursday evening, at the Institution in Tenterden Street, when the following interesting programme was gone through:—

Duet, Air and Variations in G, for the Pianoforte (Miss Fernandez and Miss Smith)—Mozart; Aria, "Per questa bella mano" (Mr. Pope)—Mozart; Andante Cantabile and Presto Agitato, Pianoforte (Miss Ludovici)—Mendelssohn; Duet, "Io le diro che l'amo" (Mrs. Turner and Mr. Guy)—Handel; Prelude and Caprice, from Partita, in C minor, Pianoforte (Miss Mary Taylor)—J. S. Bach; Gavotte, "Che se fiera" (Mr. Wadmore)—Handel; Duet, for Two Pianofortes, "Hommage à Handel" (Mr. Eaton Faning and Mr. L. N. Parker)—Moscheles; Aria, "Sciogli l'inno dei profeti" (Miss Jessie Jones)—Graun; Prelude and Lesson (Op. 33), Pianoforte (Miss Turner)—Sir W. Sterndale Bennett; Prelude, in A minor (2nd English Suite), Pianoforte (Miss Barkley)—J. S. Bach; Songs (MS.), "How canst thou calmly slumber?" and "The steadfast lover" (Mr. Howells)—Oliveria Prescott (Student); Polonaise, in C sharp minor (Les Favorites, No. 1, Op. 26), Pianoforte (Miss Cornish)—Chopin; Duetto, "Quel tuo petto" (Miss Jessie Jones and Mr. Aldersey)—Stradella; Song, "Bird, fly from hence" (Mr. Guy), (violoncello obbligato, Mr. Buels)—Kücken; Duet, "L'Appassionata," Pianoforte (Miss Martin and Miss Mary Taylor)—Walter Macfarren; Trio, "Daughter of a wond'rous race" (Undine) (Miss Beasley, Mr. Howells, and Mr. McNaught)—Benedict.

The accompanists of the vocal music were Mr. Eaton Faunning and Mr. Walter Fitton.

FREDERICK CLAY'S MUSIC TO ORIANA.

(From the "Observer.")

The music of Oriana is of such importance that it must not be passed over lightly. Generally speaking, unless a piece is an operetta, or opera bouffe, the musical element is of small consideration, and so treated both by performers and audience; but here we have an instance in which it is of as much consequence as the dialogue. There are some twelve or fourteen numbers, each of which possesses interest; and although, from the nature of the piece, there is a certain similarity of colouring in them, anything like monotony has been skilfully avoided, and a great variety of rhythm, melody, and harmony obtained. Of all the dramatic musical pieces Mr. Clay has produced of late, this, we are inclined to think, is the freshest and most carefully worked; and bearing in mind the small (but, thanks to Mr. J. T. Haines, musical director, excellent) material he has had to do with in the orchestra, the variety of pretty orchestral effect he has obtained is remarkable. Rich instrumentation, answering to colouring in painting, is, of course, a gift, but a gift requiring much practice to develop original effects. Mr. Clay, without doubt, has this gift; and every successive production of his pen shows the care with which he strives to cultivate it, and the success which attends his efforts. He is to be specially commended for the reticence with which he deals with his brass instruments—a sacrifice amply compensated by the brilliant effect of those numbers in which he does use them. After a bright little chorus, with solo for Chloe, followed shortly after by another and equally pretty one for the entrance of Raymond, we come to a song for the King, "Shepherd Prince, thy choice was right," vigorous and sparkling, but with an undercurrent of tenderness that lends great charm to it. Passing a delicious little chorus of spirits, we arrive at the finale to the first act, "Lullaby, lullaby, they are dreaming, dreaming," which is simply lovely. Its construction shows a considerable command of form (that stumbling-block of all would-be composers), and is a gratifying evidence of the conscientiousness of Mr. Clay's work. With its charming orchestral treatment, and clear, simple vocal writing, the effect on the audience is irresistible. We would gladly dwell longer upon the merits of the music, but time and space forbid it. Enough, then, to mention the quaint and tender song, with the nonsense words, "The moon fell in love," charmingly sung by Miss Rose Massey; the bright martial chorus at the end of the second act; a characteristic song for Miss Hughes, "O, isn't my love a dear;" the poetical reverie for Mr. Montague, "I am weary of my life;" and last, not least, the delicate little bits of melos throughout. These we can only indicate, and call attention to their respective beauties.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

RICHARD WAGNER.

Apropos of the Wagner Society's first concert, we read as follows in the Daily Telegraph:—

"Having nearly completed his trilogy, Der Ring des Niebelungen, Herr Richard Wagner desires to produce those works in a manner befitting their importance as a perfect illustration of his theory and a crowning proof of his genius. But, with ordinary resources, such an achievement would be impossible, and hence a special theatre is now being erected at Bayreuth, in Bavaria, where, with ample means and appliances, the most celebrated of operatic reformers will next year show the world what he desires to have accepted as the musical drama of the future. This will involve a large expenditure of money—money for an edifice colossal enough to hold the assembled representatives of two hemispheres; money for machinery and stage requisites of the most complicated and elaborate character; and money wherewith to pay an army of executants. But when Herr Wagner conceived the scheme, he did it with that boundless faith in himself which has so often carried him safely through greater enterprises. The man who had fought musical Europe almost single-handed, and won victory after victory over enemies both powerful and unscrupulous, was not the man to shrink from the task upon which he is now engaged. He looked, of course, for help from those who, in all countries, admire him, and share his enthusiasm for the cause; but from England, most probably, he expected least help of all. Our conservative nation had a season's experience of Herr Wagner eighteen years ago, and learned to regard him as an impracticable visionary, with strong self-assertive powers, and a disinclination to show respect for established facts and received opinions. Hence his brief English career was a time of conflict that left its mark in the shape of a readiness to revile us whenever a chance of doing so came to his caustic and dangerous pen. But to hear that the metropolis which, so to speak, cast him out as an unhealthy thing, had formed a Wagner Society, with a nobleman at its head, and the support of his Bayreuth scheme for its object, must have been the sweetest possible revenge. Surprised, most probably, Herr Wagner was not—he may have wondered that England had remained so long without giving a sign of adhesion to his cause; but we can readily imagine that more acceptable even than the triumph of Lohengrin at Bologna were the first proofs that the obstinate islanders had begun to yield. The new society, over which Lord Lindsay presides, with Dr. Franz Hüffer as secretary, proposes to help the Bayreuth performances by inviting subscriptions, and giving concerts of music selected from Herr Wagner's operas. Its first concert took place at the Hanover Square Rooms on Wednesday last, with results so encouraging that a repetition in St. James's Hall, at 'popular prices,' was at once resolved upon. We confess our unfeigned satisfaction that the appeal of the society was thus met. The art-theories of Herr Wagner are not now merely ideas put forward by one man, but they are the ideas of hosts of men in every country where music is cherished. Moreover, they have long been separated from Herr Wagner's not over-attracting personality; and they are also separable from his works, though his works are properly regarded at present in the light of their completest illustration. It would, therefore, have been regretable—nay, discreditable—if the Wagner Society had appealed in vain for help towards a complete exposition of doctrines seriously preached, seriously received by men of intelligence, and having a serious bearing upon the future of art. England should give substantial aid to the Bayreuth scheme—not for Herr Wagner's sake, nor for the sake of his operas, but in order that theories which, if accepted, would revolutionise the lyric drama, may have such a trial before the world as will leave no chance of appeal. It is from this point of view that we would support the new society; and we shall be greatly surprised if many earnest lovers of art fail to do the same for similar reasons. A discussion of Herr Wagner's fundamental ideas cannot be entered upon here, or we might easily show that they are based upon considerations by no means foreign to minds which have thoughtfully exercised themselves upon the questions at issue. Whether Herr Wagner himself is the man best fitted to put those ideas to the test of practice is another question, and one of far less consequence. Herr Wagner will go the way of all flesh, and his operas may perish also; but he has put thoughts into men's minds which find more and more acceptance as they are more and more dispassionately examined. This fact will be his monument when, perhaps, greater musicians have superseded him as a composer. A nobler monument ambition could hardly desire."

REVIEWS.

CRAMER, WOOD & Co. (Dublin).

Alas! Words by GEORGE MACDONALD, LL.D. Music by the Countess of CHARLEMONT.

THE very simple music of this song is also very expressive. Its noble and fair composer evidently felt deeply the true poetry of Dr. Macdonald, and out of her true feeling she has evolved a genuine, sympathetic melody, which serves to heighten its effect and intensify its meaning. We observe that the song has been adopted by Mdlle. Tietjens; and it might, with equal propriety, be adopted by any other artist who knows how to express something more than mere sounds.

NUREMBERG.—A case just tried here shows that it is not in England and America only that "Theatrical Agency" plays an important part at the present day in dramatic and operatic affairs. As every one at all acquainted with the stage in Germany is aware, artists frequently give undertakings binding them to pay an agent a certain percentage for a certain time on every engagement, no matter whether the latter has been procured through the instrumentality of the agent or not. It appears that Herr Riese, a tenor at the Stadttheater here, signed an agreement to pay Herr Röder, a well-known theatrical agent in Berlin, 5 per cent. on all ordinary engagements, and 10 per cent. on all "star engagements" ("Gastspiele"), during the space of six years, even though Herr Röder's services had not been required to obtain them. Herr Riese fulfilled a starring engagement last summer at the Theatre Royal Dresden, and Herr Röder, though he had nothing to do in the matter, put in a claim for his percentage. Herr Riese refused to satisfy this claim, and thereupon Herr Röder brought an action. He lost it, however, the Court ruling that an agreement to fulfil a promise without some consideration was invalid, and that, moreover, it appeared highly probable that the agreement was given by the artist merely to escape adverse criticism—for, in Germany, as in Italy, theatrical agents have journals of their own.

PANAMA.—On Saturday evening, 18th inst., the French Lyrical Company gave their second entertainment, and with every success on their part. The drinking song in Galatea, as sung by Madame Adrienne, was worthy of all applause. The performances on Sunday night were, if anything, still finer. The second and fourth acts especially of the celebrated opera bouffe, the Grand Duchesse de Gerolstein, were well rendered, and called forth great applause. The rôle of La Duchesse, by Madame Adrienne, could not have been executed with a more piquant grace and artistic talent. We regret to see their efforts were rewarded by so poor houses. We trust, before they go, the intelligent and music-loving public of Panama will do the company justice by its appreciation.—Panama Star..

BRUNSWICK.—Particular attention is now paid by the members of the Musical Union to the cultivation of classical music. Every Wednesday evening is set apart for overtures, symphonies, chamber-compositions, &c. There was a large meeting of members to celebrate Mozart's birthday; that anniversary was kept at the Theatre by the performance of a very ordinary farcical production, entitled Berlin wie es weint und lacht!

WAIFS.

So Mdme. Goddard, the queen of English pianoforte players, has left us. I am very sorry, for her performances always charmed me; but I am very inquisitive to know why she has bade us farewell. Is her retirement a really voluntary act? I can hardly believe it; and yet I suppose I must.—Sporting Times.

The death is announced of M. Hippolyte Prévost, the musical critic of La France.

We regret to hear of the somewhat grave indisposition of Mrs. Charles Dickens.

Auber's Premier Jour de Bonheur was revived at the Opéra Comique last week, with great success.

M. Didot has just published L'Histoire de la Musique dramatique en France, by M. Gustave Choquet.

At the Crystal Palace Concert of to-day, Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan's Festival Te Deum is to be performed.

The Paris Conservatoire gave two concerts last Sunday, under the patronage of Mdme. Thiers, in aid of the wounded in the late war.

The death is also announced of M. Lysberg, a pianist, and composer of many popular works in the style of Chopin, who was his master.

Mr. Francis Howell's oratorio, The Land of Promise, is in rehearsal, and shortly about to be given in public, by the Abingdon Musical Association.

There is said to be a man in Cincinnati in possession of such a powerful memory that he is employed by the Humane Society to remember the poor.

The Gazette Musicale states that Mdme. Adelina Patti, who will make her appearance early in April at Covent Garden, has signed for two years with Mr. Gye.

Mdme. Arabella Goddard was to play, last night, at Mr. Charles Halle's fifth concert at Liverpool—one of the series organized by the enterprising firm of Messrs. Hime and Son.

Le Ménéstrel speaks of a rich Irishman who is said to be building a concert room in the Champs Elysées, all for himself. He proposes to engage a concert troupe, all for himself in addition.

Tannhäuser was produced at the Brussells T'héâtre de la Monnaie last week. The accounts of its reception vary according to the opinions of the writers, and we do not know what to take for truth.

The Hungarian parliament has just determined upon the establishment of a National Conservatoire of Music, and has voted an annual subvention of 36,000 florins. The presidency has been offered to Franz Liszt. What does the British Parliament, in face of such an example?

The annual festival in aid of the Dramatic Sick Fund took place at Willis's Rooms on Wednesday evening. Mr. H. J. Byron presided, and commended the objects of the charity in a felicitious and humorous speech. Mrs. Stirling replied in behalf of the institution in an address which was greatly applauded.

A conspiracy for purposes of theft, among the employées of the Parisian musical publishers, has just been discovered. Two of the ringleaders were sentenced last week to three years imprisonment, and a music-seller named Bathlot, who received the stolen goods, has to expiate his offence by four years of hard labour.

After Mr. J. F. Barnett's performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto in D minor, at the British Orchestral Society's concert, H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh shook him warmly by the hand and expressed himself much pleased with the young pianist's success. The concerto was the same that Mr. Barnett played on the occasion of his début at the New Philharmonic Society (under the conductorship of the late Dr. Spohr), when scarcely fourteen years of age.

Mr. Land, conductor of the London Glee and Madrigal Union, has been appointed secretary to the Noblemen and Gentlemen's Catch Club, vacant by the death of Mr. Bradbury. The Noblemen and Gentlemen's Catch Club was instituted in the year 1761 by a number of noblemen and gentlemen, for the encouragement and fostering of native talent in the composition and performance of glees, catches, canons, &c.; a species of music peculiar to this country, and for which it is considered to be unrivalled.

An adaptation of M. Sardou's celebrated French play, Rabagas has been produced at the St. James's Theatre. Mr. Stephen Fiske is responsible for the English version, and the political significance of the satire appears anything but Gallic. The caste includes Mr. Howe, of the Haymarket; Mr. Charles Wyndham, his first appearance in England since his return from America; and Miss Rose Lisle. Some new scenery has been painted for it by Mr. Julian Hicks. Taken altogether, there is every probability of Rabagas creating as great a furore here as it did in Paris.

Mr. Kuhe's festival, which lasted nearly a fortnight, and terminated on Monday night with the usual benefit performance, was the most successful that has yet been given. On the last night of the concerts a supper took place at Mutton's Restaurant, King's Road, Brighton, at which there was a party numbering sixty, including many of the artists engaged, as well as several private friends of the enterprising director. On this occasion Mr. Kuhe announced that it was his intention to repeat the festival next year.

The Hereford Musical Festival, the 150th year of the meetings of the Three Choirs, is fixed for the 9th, 10th, 11th, and 12th of September. In addition to the new oratorio, Hagar, by Sir W. G. Ouseley, the Oxford Professor of Music, a new work by Dr. Wesley, organist of Gloucester Cathedral, will be produced, and Spohr's Christian's Prayer will be given. Mendelssohn's Elijah and St. Paul, Handel's Jephtha and the Messiah, will also be performed. There will be four morning, and one evening, sacred performances in the Cathedral, and two secular evening concerts in the Shire Hall. Mr. Townshend Smith, the organist, will be the conductor.

The Edinburgh Daily Review thus speaks of Mdlle. Justine Macvitz, Mr. Mapleson's new contralto:—

"Mdlle. Justine Macvitz, who appeared for the first time before an Edinburgh audience, is beyond all question a vocalist possessing great natural gifts, improved by careful and judicious training. Her voice is a contralto of great strength, and of such a range that we should feel inclined to class her as a mezzo-soprano, were it not for the unmistakable contralto ring which is apparent in her highest notes. In the upper register her tones are quite clear, pure, and round, though, we think, wanting in sweetness. Her voice is decidedly best in the middle register; her lower notes are rather hard, and lose their clearness when the artist seeks to impart especial emotion to her singing. This, however, is probably a defect from which further experience will enable Mdlle. Macvitz to free herself. On the whole she possesses a voice of superb quality and complete freshness. Her style is good; it is simple almost to severity, but she, at the same time, possesses great declamatory power and skill as an executant, and will in all likelihood achieve a high reputation on the lyric stage."

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine, (Longman & Co.,) they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from, Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

PREFACE.

No country possesses more good voices than England, and many voices would be a fortune to their owners if they knew how to use them.

Vocal Exercises, however, are much neglected, owing, in a great measure, to their monotony of passage and of style.

The object of these Studies is to make practice as attractive as possible, and the Waltz form has therefore been chosen for its liveliness.

A selection has been made of passages best suited to give flexibility to the voice, and the six Waltzes here presented contain the germs of a thorough method of vocal practice.

The Italian language is preferred on account of the openness of the vowels; but these studies can be used advantageously without words, by simply "vocalising" on the vowel A (pronounced in Italian, Ah.)

Commas (,) are placed where breath is to be taken. At first, however, pupils should practise each study very slowly, and draw breath whenever found necessary.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION.

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country. The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. VAN PRAAG.

MR. VAN PRAAG, who has been for many years past well known to the members of the Musical Profession, and the public, as holding a responsible position at the principal Concert-rooms of the West End, is now, in his 74th year. In addition to his failing health and strength, he has also recently become a widower, and is, by this sad bereavement, left alone, with not a relative in England to aid or take care of him. He has children in California who wish him to go out to them, and it is his own desire, notwithstanding his age and infirmities, to do so. Want of means for undertaking so long and expensive a journey, which his children are unable to supply, however, preclude the possibility of his leaving England. Under these circumstances, a few friends, well able to bear witness to his respectability, honesty, and courtesy in the discharge of the duties he has so "well and worthily fulfilled," are anxious to raise a Subscription in his behalf, to which contributions are earnestly and respectfully requested.

ANOTHER WORLD.*

(From the "Era.")

Building upon the theory of the plurality of worlds, or the fact that astronomers maintain that the planets of the solar system are tenanted by mortals like ourselves, the author of this singular book professes to give an account of some of the ways peculiar to the inhabitants of one of these star worlds, and of their mortal and intellectual condition, adding the most minute particulars of costume, food, travelling, amusements, &c. A comparison of many theories and statements as advanced with our life at present, on the only planet we have hitherto become acquainted with, furnishes the author with scope for much ingenious dissertation, and not a little good-humoured satire upon the manners and customs of London society as compared with the highly cultivated position of the Star City of Montalluyah. In that favoured region many of the miseries and blunders of our social scheme are either unknown altogether or so modified by benevolence and cultivation as to have scarcely any influence upon the mass of the people. Physical punishment for offences is unknown in Montalluyah. We presume there are no garotters, no wife beaters, no stabbers or poisoners in the Star City, consequently the coercion required is of the mildest quality, as there is no record of stalwart vagrants receiving a number of lashes from the "cat," nor any mention of rogues and vagabonds taking a few weeks' exercise upon the treadmill. Equally mild and gentle appears to be the training of the Montalluyah youth. We hear nothing of Winchester "tunding," and both birch and cane are discarded in the academies of the Star City, for we read :—

"A general feature in the correction of faults is the absence of violent punishment. We wish to raise and not degrade our children, and, perhaps, implant the seeds of cruelty. We do not correct even our animals by blows. Horses, for instance, are never struck. Whips, with a small thong at the ends, are used only to flourish and to make sounds which the horse knows, but they are not used to strike the animal. Other moods are employed for curing viciousness, each according to the nature of the vice. In the case of a kicking horse, he is placed in a machine which is closed on him, the machine being so constructed that when shut it effectually prevents the animal moving, and he is kept there in the same position for hours. If, when taken out, he again kicks, he is placed back again immediately. The process is repeated when necessary over and over again, until the very sight of the machine will completely cow the animal, and he is effectually cured.

No portion of the work will afford greater amusement, and even instruction, to feminine readers, than the history given by the author of "Courtship and Marriage in the Star City." Instead of the narrow-minded and imperfectly developed boarding-school young lady of our own backward clime, we are told that "all the incipient faults of woman" are eradicated by means of careful training; that her powers of attraction are increased, her health strengthened; that she becomes in every way fitted for the position which her talents and virtues entitle her to fill; that is to say, the position of a wife, which the author evidently estimates as the highest and most important—"Woman's Right" in the city of Montalluyah. He not only dwells most minutely upon the processes by which the feminine inhabitants of the Star Worlds arrive at so much perfection, but describes a novel system of choosing a husband. For instance:—

"During thirty-one evenings in succession the girl intended for the marriage state is placed in an assemblage composed of eighty-five young men, one of whom she is expected to choose; but, however quickly her mind may be made up, she is not allowed to announce her decision till the thirty-first evening has arrived. The eighty-five young men are selected by the Councils from those only who have declared their intention of marrying. Any man of the same rank as the lady, who is desirous to be one of the eighty-five, is generally nominated at once; and if the girl has any especial liking for one particular person, she is allowed to communicate the fact privately to one of the ladies of the Council. At these meetings the girl wears a peculiar head-dress with a star in front to distinguish her from other ladies who are allowed to be present, but who, however, are not expected to pay court to the gentlemen. Before a week has elapsed the maiden of the star has generally intimated, by look, who is likely to be the selected one. Sometimes, however, she is fickle, and when one, encouraged by her expressive glance, has paid her court, she will encourage another, and another, and another."

We confess to have been quite consoled by a portion of the last extract we have made.

"A perfect woman, nobly planned
To warn, to comfort, and command," as Wordsworth says, is, without doubt, an estimable creature, and the Star City of Montalluyah appears to be wonderfully successful in producing such. But there is a touch of feminine human nature in the picture of the young lady who indulges in a bit of flirtation and coquets "with another, and another, and another," which is truly refreshing after the solemnity of disclosing a damsel's especial preference "to the ladies of the Council." Herein we think the more simple practice of English life preferable even to the system of the Star City. Our author does not, like novelists, end his story here, but speaks of married life with a latent touch of satire at many an English household. He says:—

"Women are instructed in the art of pleasing, and the handsomest and most gifted exert themselves to this end. They are required to attend to their personal appearance abroad and at home. The married especially are enjoined to attend to this as much in the presence of their husbands as before strangers. A different custom prevailed in former times, when women, after they had been some time married, thinking that their husband's affection was secured, gave themselves no further care to please him, though still taking pains to appear handsome and fascinating to others. It was for visitors and strangers that the most comely apparel and the most engaging manners were put on. The consequence was that the husband often preferred the society of those who in appearance, at least, seemed to care more for him than did his own wife. This was the cause of much of the immorality which formerly existed in our world."

By this it would seem that the Star City in its domestic and social life had not always been in the pure and elevated condition in which the author found it, and the hint of "the immorality which formerly existed in our world" is extremely suggestive. Can it be possible that, like naughty Paris, and almost equally naughty London, the demi-monde was not wholly unknown in the Star City of Montalluyah. Tight lacing, we learn, is not tolerated there.

"Women are not allowed to wear stays or in any way to confine the waist. Indeed such encumbrances would serve no good purpose, inasmuch as their forms are actually beautiful; their spines, in consequence of their physical education, are strong, and every part of the person, which might otherwise possibly require support, is in its proper place."

In spite of the perfection of womanhood in the Star Worlds we learn with regret that Time there, as here, steals the soft fire of the eye and the fair bloom of the cheek, and therefore a little assistance from art is not wholly rejected when nature begins to fail.

"Cosmetics for the reparation of beauty are not needed, but women of all ranks are enjoined to use various precautions for its preservation. We have cosmetics very efficacious for protecting the face from the burning sun, for keeping cool the natural moisture, for preserving the complexion and for preventing wrinkles. In our climate the heat distends the skin, and, by inducing excessive perspiration, reduces the fat required to support it. But for our cosmetics, wrinkles would be formed at an early age. As it is, the skin and complexion, as well as the form and features, are now preserved to the last period of life.

We are almost afraid to quote from the chapters relating to costume lest we make some of our feminine readers envious. The richness and splendour of Montalluyah dresses, in which all kinds of precious stones and exquisite tissues are introduced, make the descriptions in modern fashion books seem ridiculously tame; while for coiffure what will the ladies say to this?—

"In the hair is sometimes worn an ornament forming two wings, each consisting of a single diamond, which moves on small fine hinges, and is so arranged that the least breath of air will set it in motion. In the centre, uniting the two wings, is a small crimson stone, surmounted by a large round stone of purple-blue, from which sprouts out a very fine dagger of a greenish gold colour. The rest of the head-dress is made of fine metal, chosen for its lightness, of the same tints. These metals are of equal, perhaps greater, value than gold, but are chosen for their qualities. The necklace and anklets correspond in character to the head-dress, with the addition to the former of one large pearl, which hangs to the wings and rests on the lady's bosom. The bracelets are made in your Greek style—bands of gold set with large pearls. The soles to protect the feet are gilded with ravine metal. The sandals, which are of purple enamel of a peculiar kind, are often ornamented with jewels. The fan is composed of the choicest feathers of our native birds, and set in ravine metal of the most beautiful kind, studded with pearls and other precious stones.

What a sensation a lady dressed like this would make at the opera during the forthcoming season! The author describes masculine costume as well, but does not rise to the same height. Even in the Star Worlds man is contented to play second fiddle beside his more graceful feminine rival. We might quote much more and fill many columns from this curious work, but we have, probably, said enough to stimulate the curiosity of our readers, who will, we have no doubt, speedily procure it, and peruse for themselves the fanciful and elaborate descriptions of the author. Many amusing and clever suggestions are embodied in its pages, and we cannot help suspecting that some of the ingenious speculations regarding the Star Worlds are intended by the author as good-humoured satires upon the familiar institutions of this hum-drum every-day life of ours.

PAULINE LUCCA AT BOSTON.

(From the "Boston Daily Globe.")

The brief season of opera now closed was remarkable in several respects. It enjoyed a share of prosperity few would have ventured to prophecy, the indifference with which musical entertainments of a high class were received here during the earlier part of our musical season, taken into consideration. Rubinstein came and departed without creating any great amount of interest; Thomas's orchestra was comparatively neglected, and concerts were but poorly patronized. The fire had much to do with this, and it was to be expected that the same fate awaited the operatic venture. In fact, an effort was made to cancel the engagement, the opera management thinking that a city which had lost over seventy millions by fire was not in the mood to indulge in so great a luxury. However, the experiment was tried, and with a result, under the circumstances, extraordinary. To the complications that stood in the way of success must be added stormy and disagreeable weather, the general alarm regarding small-pox in our midst, and the high prices charged for admission. Utter failure was foretold, but how rashly, the large and brilliant audiences that have filled the theatres nightly can best testify. Taking all these things into consideration, we do not overstate the case when we say that the season was an overwhelming success.

For nothing was it more noticeable, and for nothing will it be more memorable, than for the opportunity afforded us of seeing and hearing Mdme. Pauline Lucca, undoubtedly the most powerful, intelligent, and versatile lyric artist of whom the modern stage can boast. Her glorious acting, full of fire, pathos, and individuality, astonished and charmed the public. Its rare intellectuality would win Mdme. Lucca a proud rank among the great artists of our day, even if she could not sing a note. On the other hand, her large, clear, and sympathetic voice, noble in volume and richness, her pure and solid method, her style, quite free from all meretricious ornament, make her scarcely less remarkable as a vocalist. It is true we got no "musical fireworks" from Mdme. Lucca; but we do get a passion, a tenderness, an expression far more rare and exquisite. The former merely astonish, but the latter enthrall. The limits of her powers are an enormous distance apart. From Zerlina in Fra Diavolo, to Valentine in Les Huguenots, from Cherubino in Le Nozze di Figaro, to Marguerite in Faust, from Zerlina in Don Giovanni, to Mignon. These are leaps indeed, when it is considered that in each impersonation this incomparable artist produced a masterpiece of acting and singing. She excelled alike in tragedy and in comedy. Therefore we say the season that introduced Mdme. Lucca to us must remain memorable in our musical history.

The operas given during the season were La Favorita, Faust, Les Huguenots, Don Giovanni, Le Nozze di Figaro, Fra Diavolo, Mignon—in all which Mdme. Lucca appeared—Il Trovatore and Lucrezia Borgia. There was but one postponement, the opening night, when Mdme. Lucca was unable to appear; and one disappointment, on the night Il Trovatore was to have been repeated, when Miss Kellogg was attacked with a violent cold, which caused the substitution of Lucrezia Borgia. The climate affected several of the artists severely; but all well summed up, there remains the indubitable fact that the season afforded both pleasure and satisfaction to the large audiences that attended. Mdme. Lucca was the great attraction, and her powers would have eclipsed any support by which she might have been surrounded. We shall await her return among us with the most agreeable memories and the most pleasant anticipations.

PESTH.—The establishment of a national Academy of Music has been definitely resolved on by the Hungarian Parliament, who have voted an annual grant of 36,000 florins for the purpose. The Abbate Franz Liszt will be at the head of the new institution.

MUSIC AT VIENNA.

Nothing but a serious occupation, which has completely absorbed my mind as well as my time, could have made me neglect the Musical World for a while. Therefore I may exclaim with Horatius: "I am now obliged to tack about, and to regain the track I had deserted." Et d'abord, let us begin with the concerts, of which we have had a very sufficient amount, and "d'ogni mistura, e d'ogni cotta," as Dulcamara would say in the Elisir d'Amore.

The new leader of the concerts of the Conservatoire, Herr Brahms, successor of Rubinstein, is decidedly a very good acquisition, and deserves great praise for the tasteful correctness in his delivering of classical music, as well as for the arrangement of the programms, affording an interesting variety, through the introduction of the best modern musical products.

The beautiful organ erected in the large concert room of the Conservatoire has greatly increased the charm of our musical recreations, and we shall have the opportunity of experiencing the beneficial influence of it, on the evening of the 28th of February, when Saul of Händel will be performed, the artists engaged for the occasion being the ladies Dustmann and Bettelheim (soprano and contralto) and the gentlemen Walter 1°, Pirk 2° tenor, as well as Scoria, bass.

As a very worthy competitor of Hellmesberger's Quartet-Society, we have got at least a capital new one; under the direction of Herr Door, a first rate pianist, and professor at our Conservatoire. The Quartetto Fiorentino, under Becker's leadership, has payed us a visit this winter, and met with the usual enthusiasm.

Among the thousand and one soirées and matinées given by foreign artists during the present season, we must mention as attractive in every respect, first of all the concerts of Madame Schumann and Joachim, who had been previously applauded in a concert of the Conservatoire, as well as in one given by the Philarmonic Society. In second lieu we may notice two pianoforte recitals given by Herr Bülow, and last, but not least, the two concerts of Signor and Madame Jaell.

Since the opening of the new and elegant concert room situated in the Herrengasse and belonging to the well known pianoforte manufacturer, Herren Bösendorfer, almost all the small concerts take place in this establishment.

The appearence of Dr. Ferdinand Hiller at a concert of the Conservatoire last month, was decidedly the most brilliant musical feature of the present season. Hiller, who came to pay a visit to his daughter (a great actress engaged at the Stadttheater here) had to direct his overture to the Demetrius of Schiller; but as the orchestral parts of this piece did not arrive in time, he substituted his Concert-overture in D minor, a very beautiful work, full of melodic original ideas as well as rhythmical power. Hiller was enthusiastically received on his appearence, and recalled several times at the end of the overture.

Certainly no other living German musician deserves the admiration and reverence of the public in such a high degree as Ferdinand Hiller; not only as a productive genuine classical composer and pianist belonging to the very best old school, but as a great orchestra-director as well as a first rate musical critic and lettered man. Ferdinand Hiller has indefatigably worked during nearly forty years, spending the largest part of his own private fortune to promote the increment of pure and æsthetical musical art in Germany and elsewhere.

At the Imperial operahouse of Vienna nothing new about the singers, excepting that the old ones are become older still, and no young talents have been engaged on which we could build the hope of a better future. The ladies, Dustmann, Ehnn, and Materno, as well as the gentlemen, Walter, Schmidt, Drochsler, Beck, Adams, etc., have no more voice, and are more or less quite passs. Bignio has got a pretty bariton voice and a fine appearence, but his singing, you heard it at Drury Lane last season. Müller had a very fine tenor voice when I first heard him in Cassel about six years ago; but since that time, having learned nothing, his voice has lost its freshness and power and become guttural, and his singing and acting are become worse than ever.

Among the reprises at the Operahouse, we have had nearly nothing during this winter but Don Sebastian of Donizetti, which has been massacred through the bad reading and cutting of this capital score, by Kapellmeister Dessoff, as well as by the deficiencies of the singer intrusted with the different parts. The Iphigenie in Tauris of Gluck has been nearly half-a-dozen times on the bill, but postponed until to-day, in consequence of the alternating indisposition of one or other among the veterans who have to sing it.

Basta!—we have for the moment the great consolation that the petty-pretty-Patti is coming very soon, and with her Graziani, Nicolini, and Naudin. But alas!—they are going to give sixteen performances at the Wieden, a very small theatre; and the fabulous prices of last year are going to increase more and more. Last year I had the chance of hearing Adelina in four of her best histrionic personifications; can I, a modest mortal, hope to admire the Italo-French-American Diva this time? That is the question, and a very important one for me!

The building of the new Opera-Comique goes on very rapidly, and we can rely upon its opening next winter. If well managed, this new theater cannot fail to exercise a very beneficial influence upon the musical taste, not only of the Viennese public, but of the German audience in general.

At the Opera Comique, meine Herren and Damen you must sing and act in the finest way, and you cannot help your ignorance of the æsthetical, histrionical, and vocal rules of art, through wild screaming and insane gesticulations! In the music of the Opera Comique's répertoire there are no Barricate vocali (as Rossini stigmatized the modern vocal music, as well as the modern art of singing,) to be overthrown with open force, exciting the ignorant part of the audience to applaud your tours de force, as do they to a juggler walking on his head, or raising a weight of a hundred pounds with his teeth!

Swoboda has been engaged as artistical manager, and no doubt the first-rate talent of this singer and actor as well as his long experience of the stage, are sufficient guarantees for the succeeding of this, in every respect, welcome undertaking.

Certainly it will be a very difficult task for the manager of an Opera Comique to recruit a good troupe in a country like Germany, where, now-a-days, the singers are to be divided into two categories. To the one belong singers in possession of a good voice and natural talent, who, learning nothing of the necessary technical as well as æsthetical notions of the art of singing and acting, go on the stage under the peculiar title of natur-singers. Those singers make their way through the exhibition of their physical strength, endeavouring to surprise instead of move and affect the audience. They spoil, consequently, their voices in a few years, and leave the stage, never reaching excellence in art. The other category is composed of people in possession of small voices, who, dedicating themselves to the Offenbach-genre, try to attract the attention of the public and provocate their applauses through shamelessness and vulgar effrontery. These (especially the ladies) generally utilize the stage for some other purposes extraneous to the art, and leave it to begin another career.

Enfin, Herr Swoboda has already shown that he understands his business, having engaged the Kappelmeister, Proch, expulsed from the Imperial Operahouse through the intrigues of the Herbeck-Lewy anti-artistical sect. A better experienced musician just for the Opera Comique could not be found in Germany. Proch is an eclectic artist of the old school, accustomed to direct the opera during 38 years at the Imperial Theater, having always been leader of the orchestra during the period of the celebrated Italian seasons, and an intimate friend of Rossini, Donizetti, and Meyerbeer, who always wished to see him direct their works. Another capital acquisition made by Herr Swoboda is the engagement of the charming, the gifted, the lovely Minnie Hauck, from the Imperial Operahouse.

Among other engagements are the tenor Lederer, from Stuttgart, Fraulein Weidemann (a fine soprano), and Herr Seidemann, a capital bass, both the two last from the Marchesi's School.

Apropos of that I must communicate the good news to the London opera-goers, that Mr. Harris, having heard at Mantova La Signorina D'Angeri, mezzo-soprano, and Signor Sigelli, a tenor, as Selica and Vasco in the Africaine, has engaged them both immediately for the next season at Covent Garden.

Both singers are pupils of the Marchesi's, the young lady being a Viennese and the gentleman an Hungarian.

So, after you had the Smeroschi (who, by the way, is making furore in Cairo) last year, you will get another first singer from our Conservatoire, and no doubt you will be so pleased with the D'Angeri, as you have already been with the charming Smeroschi.

Two other singers came out from the same school last year, are engaged; one, Catherina Prohaska, a very first-rate high soprano leggiero, at Frankfort, and the other, Amelia Fremel, a contralto at the Opera here. A third one is finishing her studies under her mistress at the Conservatoire of Vienna, although already engaged a l'avance for three years, beginning from October next, at the Royal Opera in Dresden. Her name is Clementina Proska, her voice a beautiful soprano leggiero. She is very pretty, and she sings like a nightingale.—Your repentant correspondent,

M. GOUNOD INTERVIEWED.

Astonished at the success of his Faust, amidst the Babel of conflicting opinions—(musical "opinion," or, indeed, "opinion" of any sort in this world, is worth but very little indeed,—perhaps nothing)—I felt, notwithstanding the fixed and certain conclusion at which I had long since immovably arrived, that there could not possibly be any more music created after the manner of the Viennese trio, an involuntary incubation in my mental nature of an irrepressible desire to set eyes upon some of the handicraft of Charles Gounod. For operas who cares!—no, I will not increase my contempt for them as a class by turning the cover of this latest new arrival. In spite of aforesaid presentiment my sleepiness continued. At length it was said "A melody has been embossed upon a prelude of Bach's by one, Charles Gounod." "A daring hand;" thought I. A fleeting thought, giving place immediately to a flash of sunshine that penetrated my inmost soul. Its benignant ray will never cease to burn. I must see this: and Faust no longer lay unopened. The first page, while it shamed my narrow views of the "infinite variety" of art, soothed me with the reflection that sympathy with the highest and noblest feelings human nature is capable of being moved by, and devotion to the good the true and the eternal (though but in a very minute and all but imperceptible spark) still lived within my breast. My vision revealed a symphonist of the rarest and choicest kind. One who had begun where he of the "Ode to Joy" left off. I must see him. . . . Walking in the garden: a dismal courtyard where all of vegetation it might once have boasted was either covered with blacks of soot or scorched and withered from such other causes as are familiar to the denizens of great cities; broken somewhat in health; the guest of friendly English people; in the heart of London, my eyes rested on the figure of Charles Gounod. Many miles I had come, some thousands of miles. Like ancient Simeon I could now depart in peace; but his kindly face, and gentle, genial manner interpreting my boldness, favourably detained me. He filled again, for he was smoking; an umbrella was thoughtfully raised over his broad forehead by one present; for the rain was beginning to fall. He kept on walking, and, what was much more delightful to me, talked. After a few passing words he gave a smile at Haydn, whom he evidently regarded considerably. This I imagined was partly to sound me. Subsequently, he observed—"Weber is wonderful;" then some time afterwards—"Mozart has finished an era." Finding that I appeared pretty well prepared for this—"Palestrina is an ocean," he said. "What there is in that man"—after a short pause—"and Bach. These are like the two sides of an arch. Do you think there exists the sketch of the tenth symphony of Beethoven; it is said that his pupil, Ries, had it in his possession"—he continued. I replied that such a story was extant. "Beethoven," he rejoined, "is a giant." [I might have answered that there wanted not a successor in the epoch begun by Beethoven while Gounod lived, and that a fitting continuation of the "Immortal Nine," ending with the Choral, existed in that other "Choral Symphony," ycleped Faust.] Some more conversation followed, during which the new part-songs, including "Take me, mother earth, to thy cold breast," were mentioned with warm devotion. He would hear nothing about his own compositions. He alluded to some recent differences which had occurred with some of his publishers, exclaiming to me apart, as he pressed my hand in a parental manner—"I do so deplore, nobody can know how much, the time, the precious time, that is wasted in these quarrels. Good-bye." I confess, as I left the door, I was a trifle unmanned to think of the value of the moments which go to make up the period of sojourning among mortals of such a gifted genius. And then the long array of artists and composers who had been their own engravers or publishers—from Hogarth and Handel to Kelly ("importer of music and composer of wines"), Cramer, Ruskin, and Dickens. Wherewith shall we poise the balance?—what can be placed in the scale to weigh genius?

INTERVIEWING PAULINE LUCCA AT CHICAGO.

(From the "Chicago Evening Post.")

Sundry statements having been made in the press concerning the rebellious manner in which Madame Pauline Lucca left Berlin and came to the United States, and her being fined therefore, a Post reporter was instructed to ascertain, from the lips of the fair lady herself, the exact truth of the whole affair. He found the little diva cosily entrenched in the Gardner House, her front windows framing lake-scapes suggestive of the open Polar sea; but at her feet the blazing, crackling grate, whose lurid tongues darted weird reflections on her meditative face. She was philosophizing before the fire. On the reporter's entrance, she arose, greeted him with the quietness of German manners, gave him an arm-chair in comfortable proximity to the hearth, and led the way into an easy and pleasant conversation. Her English is good, although she knew not a word of it before coming to the United States. She has a naive way of dropping out of English into German, Italian, or French. She reads English perfectly. The following is the substance of the conversation:—

Rep.—"Mdme. Lucca, will you be good enough to tell The Evening Post, for the interest of the public, how you happened to leave Berlin?"

Mdme. Lucca.—"Ach! Certainement. Wiz pleasure. I left Berlin because I vished to do so!"

Rep.—"But there were legal difficultics in the way?"

Mdme. Lucca (shrugging her right shoulder)—"Not anyzing serieuse. It vas all fair enough."

Rep.—"They did not want to give you up. You were fined?"

Mdme. Lucca.—"It was just dis way. I had a contract at the Grand Operahouse, which receives a large annuity from the Government, and is, to some degree, under its control. My contract was to sing for life, or as long as I was able. I was to be paid eight thousand thalers per year for as long as I could sing, and then to be retired with the same sum for a pension during the rest of my life. In return for this secure and profitable arrangement, which relieved me of all business cares, and kept away from me all annoyance about the present or the future (and that, in an artist's life, is a great deal, I tell you,) I owed some obligation in return. So I agreed that if ever I broke my engagement I should give eight month's notice in advance, and should pay as a forfeit one year's salary."

Rep.—"But it was stated that you came away without the release of the Director or the consent of the Government. That was not true, of course?"

Mdme. Lucca.—"Das was not true. Pas du tout. I would not do anything so mean. I am a German, and I love my country and its people. I would not leave them in so ungraceful a manner. But I wished for a change. I wished to come to the United States. So I gave notice to Herr Wagner that at such a time I, Lucca, should cancel my engagement."

Rep.—"What has the Government to do with your going?"

Mdme. Lucca.—"I could not be released from my engagement without the Emperor's consent. Music is managed in our country differently from yours."

Rep.—"Then you retired with consent of 'the authorities'?"

Mdme. Lucca.—"Some malicious person started the story that I wrote the Emperor a letter, begging to be released from my fine. Das is not so."

Rep.—"You forfeited 8,000 thalers?"

Mdme. Lucca.—"It is true that I wrote the Emperor a letter. He knew why I wished to come away. I wrote to him, as I should do, requesting that I be released from my engagement on the terms of the engagement itself. That is, by his consent, and the payment of the forfeit of 8,000 thalers. And, because he knew that I wished it, he consented, I paid my 8,000 thalers and came away. That was all; and I shall go back after awhile."

Rep.—"You will take up your residence there permanently?"

Mdme. Lucca.—"Cela depend. I cannot tell that until my husband comes. He will arrive at New York in May. I love Germany. I have no home here; but, ach! ach! I hate the sea voyage!"

Madame had an apparently vivid recollection of the effect of ocean currents on gastric juice.

Rep.—"You may, then, decide to make your home here."

Mdme. Lucca.—"Quite likely. But I cannot decide until my husband comes. Wherever he goes I will go; where he prefers to stay, that place will be my home. My little daughter is now in New York with my parents."

Rep.—"How old is your little daughter?"

Mdme. Lucca.—"Two years."

Rep.—"Will she sing?"

Mdme. Lucca.—"Ah, ciel! I hope not! I love my child too much for that! I hope not!"

Rep.—"Why, madame! Are you not willing that she should inherit the great gifts God has given you?"

Mdme. Lucca.—"Ach! I would not have her born to such sorrow. The life of an artist is the saddest life on earth."

Mdme Lucca spoke very mournfully, and with suggestive earnestness. She resumed her broken thought.

Mdme. Lucca.—"I would not have her bear the misfortunes that I have borne, not for all the glory of this world!"

Rep.—"But, madame, these misfortunes—"

Mdme. Lucca.—"You know not of them! Ach! It was first the hunger—the hunger! Then I worked seven, eight, nine years with my mother, just for enough to keep us alive! My life has included every form of sorrow which any woman can have. And this stage life—ach!"

Rep.—"Then you do not enjoy it?"

Mdme. Lucca.—"No, no, no! I want my husband, my parents, my child, my home! I am not as other artists. I cannot become intoxicated, as the Celts do, with admiration, and live on in a stream of excitements. While I am on the stage, I do my very best. That is a mean artist, that is no true artist who would not abandon herself wholly to her art upon the stage—not because the public is there—for I never know that the public is there—but because of the sake of art! I do not know that anybody sees me when I am Margaret. I only know that I am being Margaret! But I shall stay on the stage just two years more."

Rep.—"You do intend to leave it, then?"

Mdme. Lucca.—"Ach, indeed I do. I do not care for so much money as other artists do. I will then have enough to accomplish all I have to undertake."

Rep.—"How do your Chicago audiences compare with those of other cities in appreciation?"

Mdme. Lucca.—"They are very kind, and very warm."

Rep.—"You are sure that you have no objection to my publishing in The Post the substance of this conversation."

Mdme. Lucca.—"No, no. That Berlin matter has been misunderstood. And I know of no reason why you should not give it as it is, if you desire to do so."

VIENNA.—Herr J. P. Gotthard, a well known music publisher, gave recently a "Novelty Matinée," when the following new works figured in the programme: 1. Julius Zellner, Op. 11, Sonata for Violoncello and Pianoforte (Herren Louis Spitzer and Anton Door); 2. Albert Count Amadei, "Bitte"; 3. Thomas Count Nyary, "Nun ist der Tag geschieden" (from Op. 2, No. 2); 4. Hermann Riedel, "Ich will von Schlachten singen" (from Op. 8, No. 1) (Herr Gustav Walter); 5. Robert Fuchs, Two Pianoforte Pieces (from Op. 2); 6. Nawratil, Two Pianoforte Pieces (from Op. 6); 7. J. P. Gotthard, Gavotte (Herr Anton Door); Carl Grammann, "Two Novelties," for Violin and Piano (Herren Dragomir Krancsevics and Anton Door); 8. Jacob Fescher, "Sehnende Hoffnung" (from Op. 3); Carl Goldmark, "Der Wald wird Dichter" (from Op. 18 H 2) (Herr Gustav Walter); 9, Heinrich von Herzogenberg, Theme and Variations for two Pianos (Herren Julius Epstein and Aug. Sturm).—The Emperor has granted permission for a space in the front of the Academical Gymnasium to be set apart as a site for the intended Beethoven Memorial. The Committee have already a sum of 40,000 florins in hand, and it is probable that the Town Council will subscribe another 5,000. There is no doubt that the remaining amount requisite will be raised without much difficulty from collections, concerts, and so on.

TO PAULINE LUCCA.

ON HEARING A FAVOURITE SONG.

Oh! sing that song, that blessed song, again,
Whose gentle cadence breathes, in numbers low,
Of hopes that flung their radiance o'er Life's way,
When Love was new, within "the long ago,"
Then breathe again that well-remember'd strain;
'Twill cheer the darkness of a lonely heart,—
Recall the brightest of Youth's vanished charms,
And soothe a sad and weary spirit's smart.

Oh! sing that sweet, that olden song, once more;
Its mellow'd echoes fall like blessings now;
I lov'd it well in happier, fairer hours,
Ere Time and Sorrow touched alike my brow.
Nay, sing it once, if only once, again,
For fond it beams a memory of the Past,
The fadeless relic of a "summer dream,"—
A dream that dawned too beautiful to last.

Long since the lips that first its strains awoke
Are pale and chill, as wordless as the tomb;
Yet comes to me her spirit when that song
Breaks star-like thro' Life's ever-haunting gloom.
Then sing that song, that blessed song, again,—
Whose flute-like murmurs breathe, in numbers low,
Of hopes that flung their radiance o'er my way,
When love was new, within "the long ago."

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The Saturday concerts continue to be carried on with genuine enterprise, and the public continue to support them with a real interest in their success. Not a week passes without some feature of special importance attracting more than ordinary attention. Now it is a rarely-heard masterpiece like Schumann's Paradise and the Peri; now it is an unknown symphony by Schubert; now an example of modern German art, such as Brahms' orchestral serenade in D; and now a specimen of contemporary English work such as Mr. Henry Gadsby's new overture, Andromeda. The inevitable result of this persistent bringing forward of novelty is to fix public attention in a way possible to nothing else; and Saturday after Saturday the amateurs of London turn their faces Sydenham-wards as though in obedience to some imperative call of duty. It used formerly to be urged against the Crystal Palace managers that they paid less than due heed to native talent, preferring to countenance the works of foreigners. Whether the charge were just or unjust matters not now, because now all ground for it is removed. Scarcely a single concert of the present season has failed to include an English work; and we may say, without fear of contradiction, that nowhere is an English composer, with any claim to notice, more sure of obtaining his right than at the Crystal Palace. We have already referred to Mr. Gadsby's Andromeda, and return to it as a case in point. Mr. Gadsby owes a good deal to the Saturday Concerts. Though made favourably known elsewhere as a composer of other than orchestral music, it is almost entirely at Sydenham that his skill in the highest form of art has appeared. Amateurs will remember the production, some time ago, of a symphonic movement and an overture, the Golden Legend, from his pen. Both made an impression so favourable that the public were inclined to receive his future works with respect, and hence the attentive hearing given to Andromeda on Saturday week. We need not trouble ourselves about the connection of Mr. Gadsby's music with the legend of the daughter of Cepheus. There may be such a connection, but it is unquestionable that the pleasure conferred by the overture is based upon more substantial grounds than the necessarily vague descriptiveness of an orchestra. Indeed, Mr. Gadsby might just as well have been satisfied to send his bantling into the world without a distinctive name. That he did not do so is only another proof of the existence of a fashion which threatens ere long to banish "pure" music altogether, and make the art, in its most abstract form, merely subservient. Dismissing the story of Andromeda as an unimportant element in the case, let us say of Mr. Gadsby's music that it excels his former works to a most satisfactory extent. The opening larghetto is all an exordium should be—it arrests attention, and by its noble and dignified character prepares the mind for what is to follow. A stirring and rather uncommon theme begins the allegro molto, with which the second subject makes an effective contrast; and, though signs of flagging are now and then apparent, the work generally is treated in a masterly way. The subject of the larghetto is well used in the allegro, helping much to sustain an interest which at times rises very high indeed. Mr. Gadsby has employed the orchestra with great command of its resources, and there can be no question that his overture will do much to enhance the reputation he has already gained by conscientious labour. We have unfeigned pleasure in recording this fact, connected as it is with a representative of native talent.

Although there was nothing of novelty, there was much of interest, in last Saturday's programme. The orchestral selections began with Beethoven's overture to Egmont, apropos of which the true theory of "applied" music was stated by Mr. Grove, who said that its aim is "not to give a definite picture of each person and each event in a story—pictures which, however well executed, no two hearers will agree about—but to pourtray the general emotions excited, and bring the audience into the same frame of mind as that with which the contemplation of the theme inspired the composer." We are glad to be associated with the clever annotator of the Crystal Palace programmes in enunciating a doctrine which alone can save orchestral music from a threatened degradation. Madame Schumann, who had a very hearty welcome, followed the overture with her late husband's Introduction and Allegro Appassionato for pianoforte and orchestra—a work of interest at any time, but of special interest when played by an artist far and away the most competent to do it justice. To praise Madame Schumann's performance of Schumann's music would indeed be to "gild refined gold," wherefore let it suffice if we simply record that at the close of her task she was summoned back to the platform amid general applause. The work, like most other things from the same source, should be heard oftener than it is; Madame Schumann also played a Notturno by Chopin, and Mendelssohn's own arrangement of the Scherzo from his music to A Midsummer Night's Dream. Another interesting feature of this concert was the last named master's Prelude and Fugue for organ (Op. 37, No. 1)—one of a set of three dedicated to Attwood, and written in 1837—that is to say, when Mendelssohn's mind was saturated with the influence of Sebastian Bach. Of its performance by Dr. John Stainer, a successor of Attwood's, there can hardly be need to speak, so often has the present organist of St. Paul's proved his executive skill in similar works. The Te Deum, written by Mr. A. S. Sullivan, in commemoration of the recovery of the Prince of Wales, closed the programme. Our opinion of this composition having been more than once expressed, it will suffice now to say that the performance was marred by one of those accidents against which no amount of care can always absolutely insure. The soprano solo was sung by Madame Pauline Rita, who had previously made a very good effect in Bishop's "Lo, hear the gentle lark." Madame Lavrowska, described as a "cantatrice russe de Pétersbourg," strengthened the favourable impression she made at the last Monday Popular Concert by her delivery of "Ah! mon fils," and Glinka's "Orphan's Song." Both were charmingly rendered, and both were followed by a recall of the artist.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

Thanks to a programme of remarkable interest, last Monday's concert was the most successful of the season, whether judged by the attendance of the public or the result of the performance. Every part of the room was crowded, and everything done elicited applause of a more or less enthusiastic nature. We record a fact of some significance when we state that not the least well-received piece was Brahms' Sextet in B flat for strings. This important composition had a hearing in St. James's Hall some two or three years ago, at the express desire of Herr Joachim; but the public gave it a cold welcome, and Mr. Chappell put it aside. If the director was justified in what he then did, still more was he justified in reproducing the work on Monday. The audience heard Brahms' music with unmistakable favour, and even if no movement had been encored, as was the Scherzo, their long and loud applause would have evidenced complete satisfaction. That the Sextet improves on acquaintance must be fully admitted. Its tunefulness is at once apparent, but the skill with which the themes are developed, the individuality of their treatment, and the high artistic feeling suggested by each portion of the work, require some degree of familiarity in order to produce their full effect. Assuming the opportunities for familiarity, it is easy to prophecy that the Sextet will take a high place in the Monday Popular répertoire. An immediate result of its very excellent performance by MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, Zerbini, Daubert, and Piatti, was to advance the reputation of Herr Brahms, and to make the way easy for other things from his pen. Beethoven's lovely Quartet in D major (Op, 18, No. 3)—a "highly-finished cabinet picture," to quote the annotator of the programme—was the only concerted piece given with the Sextet; but there were two solos, each of more than average attraction. Madame Schumann played the famous "Waldstein" Sonata of Beethoven; and Herr Joachim contributed Bach's wonderful Chaconne in D minor—both artists achieving a familiar task with equally familiar results. We need not enlarge upon the merits, in this connection, either of the pianist or of the violinist: Enough that Madame Schumann "read" Beethoven like the consummate musician she is, and that Herr Joachim played Bach as though he had devoted his genius and his life to the one work in hand. The Chaconne was received with a storm of applause, which only subsided when Herr Joachim came forward to offer, as an encore piece, a Prelude in D, also by Bach.

The second appearance of Madame Lavrowska at these concerts ratified her initial success. She sang Handel's "Lascia ch'io pianga," and Schumann's "Ich grolle nicht" (encored), so as to excite as much admiration for her artistic qualities as for her charmingly sympathetic voice. That less effect was produced in a scene from Glinka's opera, Russlan e Ludmilla, may be attributed to music which not even Madame Lavrowska, singing to the perfect accompaniment of Sir Julius Benedict, could make interesting. It is seldom that we have to record such speedy and complete success as that of the Russian artist. Happily, she deserves her good fortune.

GLOGAU.—Handel's oratorio of Samson was lately performed in a highly satisfactory manner by the members of the Singing Academy, under the direction of Herr Kniese.

MAGDEBURG.—An audience of above two thousand persons assembled a short time since in the hall of the Odeum, to hear a performance of Herr Anton Rubinstein's sacred opera, Der Thurm zu Babel, by the members of the Singing Academy. The concert opened with the overture and detached scenes from Herr Ehrlich's opera, König Georg.

CADIZ.—Meyerbeer's Dinorah has been produced with great success, the part of the heroine being sustained by Madame Ramirez-Roldan.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1873.

AS the early weeks of the season go on, erst-while nebulous enterprises take more and more definite shape, and what was once spoken of as rumour becomes fact that merely waits accomplishment. For example, we know with tolerable accuracy what are the musical projects connected with the International Exhibition. Last year, as our readers scarcely need reminding, there was a show of musical instruments, the auxiliaries of art, at South Kensington; but this year there will be an exhibition of art itself—on a scale of magnitude and under conditions worthy of note. The arrangements include a daily performance of orchestral and vocal music, in the Royal Albert Hall, directed by Mr. Joseph Barnby, who will have under his control a picked band of some sixty performers. Each programme is to contain, as a rule, a symphony or concerto, two overtures, and a selection of songs or other vocal music. It is proposed to vary this, from time to time, with operatic ballet music, and other compositions for the orchestra of a light and popular character, as well as recitals of operatic music generally. So far, good; but better remains. While standard and accepted works will receive due attention, a special effort is to be made on behalf of those which are not yet among things generally known. Mr. Barnby, if we are rightly informed, will survey the entire musical world "from China to Peru," with a keen eye for instances of undeserved neglect. Upon the victims of that neglect—and there are plenty—he will lay his hand to drag them forth into the light. An intention so admirable deserves all the support that can be given to it; especially when the man essaying to carry it out is one whose antecedents guarantee all necessary resolution. Another feature in the scheme will be the prominence given to English music. Not only are the works of our best known native composers to have a hearing, but "a door of utterance" will be thrown open to the talent which is at present mute. All compositions sent in are certain to receive careful notice, and as certain, when found worthy, to be performed. We learn that arrangements for occasional evening concerts, with both orchestra and chorus, are in contemplation; and that young native artists, vocal and instrumental, will have special facilities for making a public appearance. Assuming that the scheme thus outlined be well carried out—and it is in the right hands—the good it will accomplish is obvious, apart from the beneficial result of arrangements which are certain to place vast miscellaneous audiences under the influence of classical music. The mere exhibition of art is an excellent thing: but so is the step which gives practical encouragement to artists who are striving to make their way in the world. Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coute; and the Albert Hall scheme purposes, as far as possible, to make it cost less. This is a truly national object, worthy of national enterprise; and, if only for its sake, help should be forthcoming from all lovers of art.

Following what is now a precedent, whenever the purpose is serious, each programme will contain historical and analytical details of the works it contains. We have only to add that the concerts will be supplemented by recitals on the great organ, for which the services of Mr. Best and Dr. Stainer have been secured.

HAYDN v. SCHUBERT.

DEAR GEORGE GROVE,—The letter you addressed to me last week was as genial as the music of Father Haydn himself. No!—sneering is not your line, and I withdraw a word written, as David's charge of mendacity against all men was spoken, "in my haste." But for having taken Haydn's artificial head-covering as a symbol of his music, you must make atonement. The sentence is that, within two months, you cause to be performed one of the dear old Master's symphonies. Thus only can his Shade be appeased, to say nothing of—Yours ever,

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

In that very remarkable book, called Another World, from which our readers have no doubt perused more than one quotation, we find the subjoined description of the manner in which ladies, in the planet of which the "fragments" submitted by Hermes are disclosures, are selected by gentlemen for partners at balls:—

"A lady's hands and feet form so great a feature in the estimation of her beauty that they are made a distinctive test for deciding preferences on certain occasions. Thus, partners for the dance are sometimes chosen in a way that excites a great deal of mirth. The custom is called 'choosing by hands.' A large round screen, made expressly for the purpose, stands at one end of a ball-room; behind this a certain number of ladies—generally twelve at a time—place themselves, accompanied by the master of the ceremonies. The opening in the doorway is then closed. The screen, though not closed at the top, is sufficiently high to completely mask the ladies, and there are in it twelve or more small apertures, lined or faced with a soft crimson or other warm coloured velvet, sufficiently large to admit of a hand being passed through, so that it may be seen and criticised on the exposed side of the screen. Through one of these openings each of the ladies passes her right hand, and the gentlemen choose the hand they prefer, each by touching a spring nearest the hand selected, and at the same time announcing his name. The chosen one is immediately led out from behind the screen and presented by the master of ceremonies to the gentleman, in the midst of the applause or merriment of the company before the screen, and of the rest of the ladies behind it. Ladies are very particular about their hands and nails, and, as may easily be conceived, give them a little extra attention before going to a party."

This is extremely pretty and graceful. Hermes does not tell who was the Strauss, or Lanner, or Jullien, to compose music for the various dances.

The following, about the recent opera season in Chicago, with Pauline Lucca as the "star," appeared in the Inter-Ocean Journal of this great, populous, flourishing, and easily recouping city:—

"The onslaught of Lucca, and Kellogg, and their 'corps,' has completely overrun the fashionable world, and society has been almost stagnant for the past week. The Favorita (Pauline, Leonora,) and Faust (Pauline, Marguerite,) have been the engrossing topics in the breakfast room, and the leisure of the society-goers has been mainly occupied in the preparation of the toilet for the evenings at McVicker's. There have been a few quiet parties and the regular club socials, but few invitations have been sent out, and no important receptions have been announced. The coming week, however, bids fair to be a gay one, and large anticipations are indulged of a brilliant season after Mr. Jarrett and his troupe have departed, and the few days before Lent confine society's gaiety to a brief interval."

The excitement created by the appearance of Pauline Lucca appears not altogether to have been unclouded, if we may judge by the following—addressed to the Editor of the Chicago Tribune:—

"MORE TICKETS THAN SEATS.

"SIR,—Many people who had secured seats for to-night's opera have come away, unable to reach those seats through the immovable crowd that is filling the aisles. I hope they will demand the return of their money, and bear testimony to the wrong that has been practised, in selling more tickets than should have been sold, and then failing to preserve order and give ticket-holders the places promised them. "ONE OF THE DISAPPOINTED.

"Chicago, Feb. 7, 1873."

It used to be the case when Jenny Lind visited America; but, as Barnum was wont to say, "It can't be helped;" and, doubtless, Jarrett explains it much in the same manner.

---

Our friend the Hornet has just buzzed to the following effect:—

"Mr. John Oxenford's magnificent review in the Times has saved the fortunes of Mr. Albery's Oriana at the Globe. The manner in which the critic of the Telegraph backed water after reading Mr. Oxenford's notice was simply delicious. To eat dirt is an old simile, but this gentleman devoured Clay."

Our friend should buzz the truth, which is that Oriana has not been "saved;" that the Telegraph's second notice was as obviously written by its musical critic as was the first by its dramatic critic; and that Mr. Oxenford's article had not appeared when the Telegraph's second notice was penned. If hawks will pick out hawks' een—or, rather, if hornets will sting—they should be sure of provocation.

THE CHICAGO OPERA SEASON AND PAULINE LUCCA.

(From the "Chicago Evening Post," Feb. 8th.)

The houses which have assembled at McVicker's during the past week to witness the performances of the Maretzek Italian opera troupe have been a splendid tribute to the renaissance of good music in Chicago. The Nilsson concerts two years ago were more numerously attended than any previous entertainments, and the receipts were considered extraordinary. The Lucca house on Wednesday night was better than the best Nilsson night, and the receipts last night, when even ticket-holders were unable at eight o'clock to obtain admission, so great and so unmovable was the throng, were largely in advance of those of Wednesday. No seats are unsold for this afternoon, and there is every reason to suppose that the remaining Lucca operas will be no less numerously attended.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

The first Soirée Musicale, this season, of the West London Kilburn Musical Society took place on Monday evening, the 24th ult., in the St. Augustine Schoolroom, and, despite the inclemency of the weather, attracted a large and appreciative audience. The programme included Jackson's oratorio of Isaiah, and a miscellaneous selection. The overture to the oratorio was well rendered by the band. The fine trio with chorus, "Clash the cymbals high in air," was given most artistically by Mdme. Bernard and Messrs. Wake and Tucker. Mdme. Bernard was equally happy in the solo and chorus, "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of Hosts;" also in the air, "Oh! sinful nation." Miss Isabel Weale gave the air, "Hearken unto me," with grace and power. This young lady is one of our rising vocalists; she lately sang at the Royal Albert Hall, and was well received. The fugal chorus "In the Lord Jehovah," severely taxed the powers of the choir, but it was fully equal to the occasion. The number that received the greatest applause was the air with chorus, "Oh, Lord, I will praise Thee; the solo was allotted to Miss Warwick, whose contralto voice told with great effect. Miss Warwick and Miss Isabel Weale next gave the duo, "The Lord shall reign for ever," the rapid passages of which were faultlessly executed. The magnificent "Hallelujah," rendered with great precision both by band and chorus, brought the first part to a termination. The second part opened with Rossini's overture to Semiramide, well played by the band. Mr. H. M. Thornborow earned well merited plaudits in Blumenthal's "Requital;" Miss Warwick, in Sullivan's "Looking Back," delighted all present; Beethoven's sonata in F, for pianoforte and violin, was charmingly played by Mr. Wm. Beavan and Mr. Sommer; Mdme. Bernard's vocalisation in an aria by Verdi, was highly appreciated; Mr. Adolphus Phillips gave Arditi's "Stirrup Cup," with effect. Mozart's overture to Figaro brought the Soirée to a close. Mr. John Beavan accompanied, and Mr. Wm. Beaven conducted with ability.

The Original Mohawk Minstrels gave their fourth annual performance at the Concert Hall, Store Street, Bedford Square, on Saturday evening, March 1st. There was an entirely new programme, and several of the members made their first appearance at this hall. Among them were "Little Harry," Messrs. Harold V. Athow, Rowland Olliver, and W. Putnam. A large selection of new comic songs, ballads, laughable sketches, &c., were introduced with success. Mr. J. Francis introduced a very amusing song, "Gliding in a tram," (the words written, and the music composed, by himself), which pleased the audience immensely. Great desire was expressed to hear it again, but no encores being permitted (an excellent plan), their wish could not be gratified. Messrs. Vernon, Vaughan, and Freeman contributed to the success of the evening by their excellent singing; Mr. W. Putnam by a solo on the harp, and Mr. T. Hill by his "Prize Jig." The entertainment concluded by the performance of the laughable absurdity entitled The Manager in Difficulties which sent the audience home, delighted with what they had seen and heard.

A school of music has been established at Athens, and opened in presence of the Court. This is the first establishment of the sort in the East, and numbers already 400 pupils.

It is said that Miss Clara Louise Kellogg intends to write her biography, and that she will give "the inside history of a professional life, without any of the outside varnish." All right!

Edith Wynne Presentation Fund.—We are informed that the committee of this fund have commissioned Mr. Edwards, the eminent sculptor, of Robert Street, Hampstead Road, to excute a bust in marble of our accomplished national songstress. The amount contributed over and above the cost of such bust will be expended in the purchase of an article of jewellery, and of a design emblematic of Wales.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.

The first concert of this admirable Choir's eighteenth season took place in St. James's Hall, on Thursday week, with all the success that might have been anticipated. Over 200 members—an unusually large number—were on the orchestra; but the first piece sung proved beyond doubt that an increase of voices brought increase of strength, without lessening in any degree that refinement and delicacy for which the Choir is famous. As we stated, last week, would be the case, the programme was divided into two sections, assigned respectively to Italian and English composers; thus enabling the audience to make instructive contrasts and comparisons between the genius of two countries as it appears in the same class of works. After "God save the Queen" had been sung—by the way, the Queen's second son was present—Italy led off with Marenzio's well-known "Queen of the World,' and Converso's "When all alone, my pretty love"—two capital examples of madrigallian art as it was in the last years of the sixteenth century. Next came Croce's "Cynthia, thy charms," a work full of interest, followed by Ferretti's "Young men, I warn you," and Festa's "Down in a flowery vale." All these were sung to perfection, the last-named especially being given with marvellous clearness and accuracy. The first part ended with an example of modern Italian art in the shape of Pinsuti's serenade, "In this hour of softened splendour," which, as usual, had to be repeated. Next came the turn of England, and our "unmusical country" led off with a trump card—Samuel Wesley's motet, "In exitu Israel." Had the gifted composer of this fine work done nothing else he would have deserved a place among the best writers for the Church, so noble and dignified is its style, and so profound its science. Shame that a man so endowed did not meet with greater appreciation during his life, and does not occupy a higher place now that he is dead! Having begun so well, England followed it up with two new part-songs by Walter Macfarren, of which one, "Shepherds all and Maidens fair," is very cleverly and effectively written. After these came Ward's "Die not, fond man"—a somewhat weak thing, with all its pretence of contrapuntal skill; Wilbye's "Stay, Corydon;" Pearsall's "Take heed, ye shepherd swains;" and Sir S. Bennett's "Come live with me"—on the whole, a very effective display of art, and not one at all unworthy to mate with that of the "Land of Song." The choir sang uniformly well throughout—intonation, expression, precision, and enunciation being all that a fastidious taste could desire. The soloists were Mr. Henry Holmes (violin), Mdlle. Gaetano, Mdme. Patey, and Mr. W. H. Cummings. Mr. Holmes was encored in Tartini's Allegro in D, substituting for it a Gigue by Corelli; and the vocalists gave much satisfaction; though, as a matter of course, the doings of the Choir took first rank.

PROVINCIAL.

LIVERPOOL.—We take the following from the Liverpool Mail:—

"The project of forming a Liverpool choir of 120 voices, to compete at the Crystal Palace National Music Meetings, has now taken a definite shape. We referred to the matter some months back, when the Mayor made the suggestion to Mr. Willert Beale, and we have also indicated the nature of this year's competitions. It is intended that the Liverpool choir shall compete for prizes in the second, third, and fourth classes at the music meetings in July. £2 is to be allowed each singer towards the payment of expenses, and railway fares are also to be defrayed. As an earnest of good faith singers will have to deposit 10s. with the local committee, and will be expected to attend ten or more rehearsals under Mr. J. Sanders, some of these being open to the public. A sub-committee will select singers from the names sent in, and make other necessary arrangements. Whatever be the effect of the competitions at Sydenham, the local preparations are certain to give a healthy stimulus to the choirs at Liverpool, and may result in the revival of the musical festivals which used so much to benefit art and charity."

PLYMOUTH.—A local journal informs us that—

"With a band and chorus of close upon three hundred performers, and aided by four vocal soloists of eminence, the Plymouth Amateur Vocal Association gave the second of this season's subscription concerts. Barnett's cantata, The Ancient Mariner, and Handel's serenata, Acis and Galatea, were the works performed. Both were admirably interpreted, and the large and discriminating audience which filled the Albert Hall testified in no half-hearted manner to the intelligent pleasure which the Association afforded it. The concert was noticeable as introducing a Plymouth audience for the first time to the beauties of Handel's serenata, and to the merits of three vocalists, strangers to the town. In both respects the occasion was a success. Miss Katherine Poyntz, Madame Osborne Williams, and Mr. J. H. Pearson, proved themselves artists with whom to make acquaintance was a pleasure; and Mr. Winn, the basso, sang as effectively as he has at previous concerts of the Association. Both in the cantata and in the serenata the band—led by Mr. H. Reed, and including Mr. Holt, first violin, Mr. M. Rice, viola, Mr. F. Reed, violoncello, Mr. Kearns, oboe, and Mr. Fly, trumpet—acquitted itself most ably, and Mr. F. Löhr, the hon. conductor, wielded the bâton with a success which is now customary."

CHATHAM.—Vance's Combination and Concert Company visited this locality on Saturday evening, 1st inst., and attracted a numerous and enthusiastic audience. The party is unusually clever, and comprises the following favourite vocalists, viz—Miss Lottie Cherry, a beautifully-costumed and very handsome serio-comic; Miss Kate Farley, another attractive lady in the same line; Mr. Henry Corri; Mr. W. B. Alexandre (mimic and ventriloquist), a personage denominated on the programme as the Fakir of O O Do (who turned out to be a very clever prestidigiateur); Mr. Edward Inisdale (a brilliant solo pianist and able accompanist), and "Vance," who was only announced for two songs, being, we presume, anxious to avoid the necessity of stretching the entertainment indefinitely into Sunday morning. As it was, an unlimited encore system was established, and the "turns" of the celebrated comique multiplied exceedingly at the hands of his delighted hearers.

CHELMSFORD.—The Essex Weekly News says that—

"A successful concert was given by the eminent pianist, Mrs. John Macfarren (who is well known in Chelmsford), assisted by Miss Agnes Drummond (soprano), and Signor Bellini (basso). Those who braved the rain and cold were amply repaid by the choice musical banquet spread out before them. Any comments on the proficiency and style of Mrs. Macfarren's playing would be superfluous. Suffice it that her brilliancy of execution and finished touch obtained rounds of applause at the close of each of her selections. Hummel's 'Rondo Prestissimo' was a wonderful piece of rapid playing. Miss Drummond who has a clear soprano voice, found favour with the audience in the cavatina, 'Over hill, over dale.' In 'The lover and the bird' and 'There's nae luck about the house,' she received hearty encores. Signor Bellini has a powerful bass voice, and was very amusing in his buffo singing. The entertainment was a decided success."

COPYRIGHT AND STAGERIGHT.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—I forward a letter from Lord Lytton which may interest your readers, not only as a contribution to the elucidation of the question of copyright, but also as one of the latest utterances of the noble author on the subject. It was sent to a friend of mine who had dramatised one of Lord Lytton's novels, and who wrote to him, requesting that he would revise the MS. To his application the noble lord sent the following reply:—

SIR,—In reply to yours of the 30th, I strongly object to the dramatising my novel ——, and I shall oppose its representation on the stage, if, as my solicitor assures me, the law enables me to do so. It is the first time, however, that any author has not asked my consent before attempting to dramatise any novel of mine. I need not add that I decline looking over the MS. of an attempt to which I refuse my sanction. Your obedient servant,

12, Grosvenor Square, Oct. 3, 1872. LYTTON.

My friend thought that such a man as Lord Lytton would have the best advice on the subject; and, consequently, refrained from submitting his MS. to any theatrical manager.—I remain, yours faithfully,

March 5, 1873. HIBERNICUS.

SIR,—Mr. Henry Vizetelly has lived so long in Paris that it is only natural he should share the common ignorance of Frenchmen as to the value of French plays in England, and the operation of English International Copyright law. Of the numerous large and small plays produced in France, not more than one per cent. is found to be adaptable to the English stage; but all these plays can be protected on English ground if the authors publish an English literal translation in England within six months of the dramatic production of the pieces in France. This may be found in practice a somewhat troublesome formality to observe; and, if so, I am quite willing to help to get it modified. The theatrical manager is rarely benefited by the plunder of French authors. He has to pay for his pieces, and it matters little to him whether he pays the French author, or the English adapter, or both. I deal very little in French plays, but very much in French musical pieces: and during the last two years I have paid M. Offenbach over 25,000 francs—to say nothing of lesser sums to M. Hervé, M. Emile Jonas, and others. Whenever any piece has been produced at the Gaiety Theatre having a French or German origin, I have always fairly stated the fact in the playbills.

M. GOUNOD'S CHORAL SOCIETY.

The second concert of the new society was given on Saturday evening at St. James's Hall, to a tolerably large audience—M. Gounod himself conducting the choral works, and accompanying his own songs. The American organ, at which Dr. Stainer presided on the occasion of the first concert, was again conspicuous, and an alteration has also taken place in the massing of the choir, they occupying the central portion of the platform, while the audience were admittted to seats at the sides. This certainly "dressed" the orchestra very well. M. Gounod can by no means complain of want of popularity, for his audience were ready to applaud everything, and would, we verily believe, have had the whole programme repeated. The first portion of the concert, dedicated to the performance of sacred pieces, introduced a new song—"Abraham's Request." This, a very fine composition for baritone, was ably sung by Mr. G. Garcia, and deservedly encored. Another item was the "Sicilian Mariner's Hymn," harmonized in a masterly manner by the popular French composer. In the second part, the "Last Rose of Summer" was given with the usual effect; and violoncello and violin solos were contributed by M. Paque and Master Jacquinot. The gem of the latter section, however, was a setting of some words by Sir Philip Sidney, "My true love hath my heart," in which the composer has caught the true spirit of the Elizabethan idyll. At the next concert, March 8 (to-day), M. Gounod's Requiem will be repeated by desire, and the overture to William Tell will be given by the choir in "orchestral combination."

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

A concert was given in St. James's Hall, on Tuesday week, for the benefit of the Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind. We regret to say that the hall was but thinly attended, a result which must be wholly attributable to the inclemency of the weather. M. Noyer, who organised the concert, and to whom great praise is due, was assisted by Miss Jessie Royd, Mdlle. Gaetano, Madame Lablache, Mr. Berry, Mr. W. Locke (blind tenor), and Mr. H. A. Pope—vocalists; Madame Noyer, Messrs. Radcliffe and Oberthür—instrumentalists. Miss Royd and Mdlle Gaetano sang their songs so much to the satisfaction of the audience that they were called upon to repeat them, and Madame Lablache was recalled after her expressive rendering of Meyerbeer's "Ah! mon fils." Mr. H. A. Pope contributed the recitative and air "Licti di" (Meyerbeer), and was much applauded—as were Messrs. Berry and Locke in the songs they gave. Madame Noyer made a decidedly favourable impression by her playing of Willie Pape's pianoforte solo, "Irish Diamonds." Herr Oberthür played one of his own solos for the instrument associated with his name, and was recalled, as was M. Noyer for his performance of a fantasia for violin-piano. The part-songs, "Sabbath Bells" (Smart), "The Victor's Return" (Mendelssohn), and Sullivan's "Oh, hush thee my baby," given by the St. Cecilia Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Hargitt, were deservedly encored.

A HINT TO PAULINE LUCCA.

(From the "Chicago Tribune.")

The spectacle in McVicker's Theatre, on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday evenings, was not calculated to impress a stranger with the belief that money is tight in Chicago. It is impossible to get at the exact figures, but it is only a few dollars out of the way to say that on Monday evening there were 5,600 dollars in the house; on Wednesday evening, 6,500 dollars; and on Friday evening, 6,200 dollars; and an average of these three sums yesterday. The gross receipts of the week will probably reach 25,000 dollars. This result has not been surpassed in any city in the country. The Friday night receipts have never been equalled before in this city. On Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, indeed, if the theatre had been larger, the audience would have been larger also, as many came who could not get in. The result shows that Chicago to-day is, as she always has been, the most munificent patron of opera in this country, and that no entertainment suffers here if it is of good quality. There is no city which detects a sham more quickly, or lets it more severely alone, and there is no city which extends a more royal welcome to real talent. Miss Charlotte Cushmann, during her recent engagement, more than once acknowledged that she had never met, in all her long and varied stage life, a more cordial reception than she had here. The moralists may mourn, the financial economists may weave theories of profit and loss as much as they please, it still remains true that Chicago is bound to be amused, whether times are hard or not; and there is quite as much sound philosophy in this determination as there is in playing the Pharisee, or shaking like Faint Heart, in every crisis. The fair little Berliner will find compensation in this recognition for all the privileges she has forfeited in breaking her contract with Frederick William's Superintendent of Opera. No pent-up Utica now contracts her powers. She now belongs to the world, and in her cosmopolitan fame Chicago claims a generous place. All that is now necessary for her happiness in this world is an investment in a corner lot here, which will yield her a snug fortune when her hair gets grey, and her voice begins to quiver, and all her operatic triumphs are souvenirs of a glorious past. Many artists of renown have anchored a deposit in Chicago real estate against foul weather. There is nothing like it. It is an investment which pays. It can never be disturbed by Prussian edicts or Mallinger cabals. When the year 1900 has turned round the corner, all the artist-owners of real estate are coming here to reside on their property, and compare notes on the seasons at Crosby's and McVickers, and help on the prima donnas of the day, who are now in swaddling clothes, with no more suggestions of music about them than arise from the prick of a pin or empty stomachs.

The success of the Opera here speaks well for the general culture of Chicago. It is inevitable—absurd as it may be—that Italian Opera shall be accompanied by the whimsicalities of fashion. It is inevitable, perhaps, that people must go in a carriage; must wear purple and fine linen, and make opera an expensive luxury, but this is not a necessity of the Opera. It is only another exemplification of the fact, which has been true since the days of Adam, that there are times and occasions when Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Brown are determined not to be outdone by each other in raiment and style. Leaving out of the question, however, all the surroundings of the Opera, and coming down to its actual merits, it cannot be denied that it is a missionary of culture, and that its tendency is to improve the average taste and etiquette, and elevate the standard of music. There is no higher standard of art than music and the drama combined; and when the golden time comes, when managers can so arrange salaries as to provide a troupe of equal merit throughout, we may then look for performances at reasonable rates. Meanwhile, we advise Unsere Kleine Pauline to read the real estate advertisements in The Tribune this morning, and attentively study the lesson they teach.

MILAN.—The new opera, Fosca, by the young Brazilian composer, Senhor Gomez, has at length been produced at the Scala. It achieved a respectable success, but did not excite any particular enthusiasm. The Trovatore speaking of it, says: "As the music of Fosca pleased more the second evening than the first, it may possibly be heard to greater advantage on the third, the fourth, the fifth, the sixth, the seventh, the eighth, and end by creating a furore. . . At all events, if the music of Senhor Gomez pleases, it will certainly not do so on account of its originality. . . We may say at once, without waiting for further performances, that the music is not algebraical, mathematical or Wagnerian, as some persons might suppose; on the contrary, it is full of melodies; unfortunately, however, the melodies do not belong to Gomez, but are reminiscences, probably involuntary reminiscences, of Verdi, Meyerbeer, Gounod, and even Marchetti." The principal parts were sustained by Signore Krauss, Lamare, Signori Maurel, Bulterini, and Maini.—The rehearsals of Lohengrin at the same theatre have commenced. The cast will be as follows: Elsa, Signora Krauss; Ortruda, Signora Edelsberg; Lohengrin, Signor Campanini; Telramondo, Signor Maurel; the King, Signor Milesi; and Aroldo, Signor Buti.—Herr von Flotow's new opera, L'Ombre, will shortly be performed at the Teatro della Commedia, the artists being Signore Elvira Suardi-Repeto, Ida Augustoni, Signori Tom Karl and Grazioso.

BEETHOVEN.

O stateliest! who shall speak thy praise? who find
A fitting word to utter before thee?
Thou lonely splendour, thou consummate mind,
Who marshallest thy hosts in majesty;
Thy shadowy armies of resistless thought,
Thy subtle forces drawn from Nature's heart,
Thy solemn-breathing, mighty music, wrought
Of life and death—a miracle thou art!
The restless tides of human life, that swing
In stormy currents, thou dost touch and sway.
Deep chords within us answer, shuddering
At thy resounding voice—we cast away
All our unworthiness, made strong by thee,
Thou great uplifter of humanity!

"WHAT ARE WE DRIFTING INTO?"

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—I have read with much interest your able article upon "Newspaper criticism and the law." "What are we drifting into?" The Lord Chamberlain allows words to be spoken on the stage and dresses—heaven save the mark—to be worn that when I was a young playgoer would have been roundly hissed off the stage, and the press would have told the manager in plain English he had better remove his obnoxious wares for morality's sake and his own reputation; but now, Sir, all is changed. Let a critic do his work honestly, and call a spade, a spade, down he is pounced upon for heavy damages. Let a right thinking man give a good round hiss at any obscenities he may hear or see at one of the theatres, how soon he would be pounced upon by a policeman and dragged out, and [in all probability taken to the station-house, charged with being "drunk and creating a disturbance." Thus, public opinion is stifled to all intents and purposes—but unfortunately the public suffer—they are led astray by the announcement of the "enormous success!"—of the greatest trash ever produced—and pay their money to be disgusted, as I was the other evening—and should have expressed my feelings to that effect, only for reasons just mentioned. So I went home, hoping the day was not far distant when the public would take the matter in their own hands, and roundly hiss the lewd wantonness now exhibited upon our stage, which is undermining our social and moral condition, and which must soon place us upon a footing with the worst city in the world, where the laws of marriage and religion are set at defiance.—

Yours &c., AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

THE WAGNER SOCIETY.

Apropos of the concert given by this society, the Graphic said:—

"Whatever differences of opinion may exist as to Herr Wagner's theory of the lyric drama, all true lovers of art must unite in desiring for that theory an impartial and conclusive trial. It says no little for the impracticability of Wagnerian opera that such a trial cannot, in the estimation of Wagner himself, be given with the ordinary resources of a first-class theatre; but that a special edifice, a special stage, and special appointments of all kinds are necessary. For the provision of these things the partizans of 'Future Music' are now interesting themselves, and it is to help on the work that a Wagner Society exists among us, with Lord Lindsay as President. Readers of musical news hardly require to be told that a Festival Theatre is in course of erection at Bayreuth, in Bavaria, and that the summer of next year will witness such a performance of the four operas which make up the Ring der Nibelungen as, perhaps, Herr Wagner himself did not dream of. The concert given in Hanover Square Rooms last week was one of a series intended to bring money into the treasury, and also to expound Wagner's music to a public who know very little of it. That the second object will not be so well attained as the first is certain, because the works to be performed cannot be separated from their dramatic connection without serious loss—without, in fact, losing nearly all their significance. Herr Wagner's overtures, no doubt, have a fair chance in the concert-room, but such selections as the bridal music in Lohengrin, and Lohengrin's address to Elsa, when taken away from the stage, are placed at a disadvantage of the gravest kind."

MR. GADSBY'S "ANDROMEDA."

The Graphic thus comments upon Mr. Gadsby's new overture, produced at the Crystal Palace on Saturday week:—

"A new overture by an English composer was produced at the Crystal Palace on Saturday last. The composer is Mr. Henry Gadsby, a young musician whose works show that to high aspirations he joins considerable ability; and the overture is called Andromeda, without, however, having a very obvious connection with the lady whom Neptune so sorely persecuted. But we can afford to consider the title of an overture as a mere fancy designation when, as in this case, the music is good. Mr. Gadsby makes progress in his art, and this latest work has a good claim to be considered his best. The spirit and the dominant style of the music show that the composer has well studied both Beethoven and Schumann, and that he can reflect somewhat of the boldness of the one along with somewhat of the transcendentalism of the other. His themes are tuneful and striking, and if there be, in the working out, slight tokens of weakness, these do not take much from the interest and attraction of the work."

CONCERT AUDIENCES.

The Liverpool Porcupine, noticing a recent concert of the Liverpool Philharmonic, thus reproved Liverpudlian bad manners and bad taste:—

"The fourth subscription concert of the season, on Tuesday last, was badly attended, but, musically speaking, was a successful performance. The names of the vocalists were unknown to fame, and therefore, we presume, with that diffidence which characterises Liverpool audiences, in their own judgment, the majority of the habitués of the Philharmonic thought it better to stay away. The usual fatiguing dissipations of the expiring ball season, and the more material enjoyments of Pancake Tuesday—especially the latter—may have had considerable effect in diminishing the audience. We rather think the latter was the cause, considering the irregularity of the arrivals and the haste of the departures. The overture to Strauensee, by Meyerbeer, the first number of the programme, although well played, and of a beautiful and dreamy description, and ill-adapted to cope with the effect of noisy interruptions, was almost lost in the constant scuffle and shuffle of the assembling audience. Again, the overture to Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, equally well rendered at the close of the concert, was simply an accompaniment, à la marcia, for the retreating listeners, who must have all been at home by the time it was completed. We would respectfully suggest to the committee the propriety of hiring a barrel-organ or a German band for the purpose of playing the audience in. And we would also allow about ten minutes or a quarter of an hour before the last number to give the tasteless and vulgar majority time to run off, and the judicious few, who are possessed of sufficient judgment and good manners, to remain, an opportunity of enjoyment which their respect for the players and reverence for good music deserves."

A WARNING CASE.

(From "Watson's Art Journal.")

We publish below a letter from Mr. F. J. Molteno, which explains one of those periodical frauds perpetrated upon credulous artists by unprincipled speculators. The situation of Mr. Molteno and his daughters is a very painful one, and we trust the generous sentiment of the profession and the friends of music will respond to this simple but urgent appeal for aid, promptly and liberally. The gentlemen is of the highest respectability, but he is powerless among strangers, and three thousands miles away from his home.

Communications may be addressed to William Hall & Son, who have in the kindest manner consented to act as treasurers. The letter will be read with painful interest:—

("To the Editor of 'Watson's Art Journal.'")

"SIR,—Will you kindly permit me, through your highly-esteemed columns, to make known a case of heartless imposition, by which I have with my family been reduced to a position of the greatest distress and necessity, in the hope that some small benevolence may be extended towards us, by those having the power?

"I was induced by the persuasions of an adventurer of the name of George Phillips, to come over here from London, with my two daughters, on a six months' musical engagement, and gave up our home, &c., to do so. The result has been that, after having our effects seized for his liabilities here, and suffering every difficulty and privation, he has abandoned us to our fate, in a strange country, with no means or resources to reach England again or maintain an existence here.

"Perhaps by your being so good as to expose this shameful imposition, there may be some who would generously render us some some small aid, to enable us to reach London, and try to find some remedy for the extremities we are now reduced to.

"Wm. Hall & Son, music-publishers, 751, Broadway, have kindly offered to act as our referee in the matter, and promote the endeavour to effect our return to Great Britain.

"Trusting to your kindness in this matter, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

REVIEWS.

ENOCH & SONS.

The Musical Monthly. A Magazine of Copyright Music. Edited by Sir JULIUS BENEDICT.

OUR readers know that this extremely cheap and comprehensive serial appears in two editions each month, one containing vocal, the other instrumental (pianoforte) works. The editions for March are now before us, and we find the promise of the earlier numbers well sustained. Among the vocal pieces are an elegant and charming canzone, "Ad una Rondine," in which the facile pen of Signor Randegger appears to great advantage; a characteristic song, "Farewell," by Kücken; a Hungarian song by Gustave Jansen; a composition by F. Wachs, entitled, "Most sweet fancy," and a very pretty, simple song, "Soon will it pass away," by Franz Abt. When we record our deliberate opinion that any one of these works is worth more than the price of the lot, we offer the most eloquent criticism upon their merits, and need say no more. The pianoforte pieces are a Berceuse by Vilback, easy and expressive; an Impromptu, Atalanta, by Sir Julius Benedict, which is, in effect, a moto continuo, exceedingly brilliant and well sustained; an Allegretto, Rose Sauvage, by Baumfelder; a Tarantella by De Kontski; and a Romance, Espoir, by Jules Arnoud. All these are worthy of attention, and we infer from the spirit shown in the early numbers of the serial that the proprietors are determined to conquer success by offering to the public the best things at a price so low as to seem almost impossible.

The Songs of Scotland. With new symphonies and accompaniments by J. Pittman. The text and melodies edited by Colin Brown, Ewing Professor of Music at the Andersonian University, Glasgow.

This volume is one of three which, when completed, will present an excellent and cheap collection of the songs of Scotland, Ireland, and Wales. Now, however, we have only to do with the characteristic ditties of the "Land o' cakes," and here they are, to the number of 150, beautifully printed, handsomely bound, and ready to be anybody's for a sum so small, that it seems ridiculous. This is almost enough said, because Scotch songs "need no bush." They are general favourites, south of the Tweed as well as north of it, and the public have only to hear of this volume in order to make it their own. But we may not dismiss the collection without doing justice to the completeness and efficiency of its editing. Mr. Colin Brown, an authority on the subject of which he treats, has prefaced the songs with a very interesting essay on the characteristics of Scottish music, and he has also furnished those not "to the manner born" with a useful and much-needed glossary. We cannot too highly praise Mr. Pittman's share of the work. His symphonies, in nearly every case, are well adapted to the melodies, and he has been most successful in furnishing the melodies themselves with harmonies which are at once unobtrusive and appropriate. Some of the tunes cannot but puzzle a harmonist sorely; Mr. Pittman, however, has conquered all difficulties, and the result is one which calls forth well-nigh unqualified praise.

Down amongst the Blue Bells. Song. Written by E. F. Composed by Anthony Nish.

This is a simple story of a youth who saw a maiden "Down where the blue bells grow;" who proposed to her on the spot, and on the spot was left standing when that maiden walked away after a decisive "No!" The little tale is well told, and Mr. Nish's pleasant, unaffected music sets it off to advantage. We may add that the song, being in the repertory of the Moore and Burgess Minstrels, is furnished with a simply harmonized chorus.

He Conquers who Endures. Song. Written by Charles Dunphie, B.A. Composed by Anthony Nish.

We have here another "Minstrel" song, but of a didactic rather than a narrative order. Its teaching is unexceptionable, as the subjoined extract will show:—

"Who quells a nation's wayward will
May lord it on a throne,
But he's a mightier monarch still,
Who vanquisheth his own.
No frown of fortune lays him low,
No treacherous smile allures,
King of himself, through weal or woe,
He conquers who endures."

This is good morality as well as good verse, and we wish it all success. The music is adapted to enforce the poet's ideas without distracting attention from them to itself. Mr. Nish, in fact, has written with studied simplicity, and, therefore, with success.

A Health to Absent Friends. Song. Written by E. L. Blanchard. Composed by Meyer Lutz.

Yet another of the Moore and Burgess songs is before us, and one demanding special notice if there be anything in names. The charming verses of Mr. Blanchard are always welcome, and here they touch a chord in the human breast which cannot fail of hearty and instant response. Herr Lutz's music strongly suggests the late Balfe's popular effusions in spirit and character. The melody is pleasing and the accompaniments exhibit the taste and fancy of a musician exercised with limits unavoidably restricted. That the song ought to be a favourite in social circles is beyond question.

Chasing Away. Song. Written by E. F. Composed by Anthony Nish.

The verses of this song decidedly fall short of the present "Minstrel" standard. They are faulty in construction, and even in the refrain so often heard—"Chasing away, the billows roam"—there is a haziness which makes the author's meaning anything but clear. The music to some extent redeems the piece. It is well, and, at times, ingeniously written, while the general effect is of a pleasing character.

The Return of the Exile. Song. Written and composed by W. Meyer Lutz.

The title of this song sufficiently explains its subject, and we need only say of the music that it fairly expresses the sentiment of the verses. Not the least effective portion is the chorus, which is boldly and well harmonised, a transition from the tonic (D) to C major, and thence to the dominant seventh of B flat, having a special effect.

The Other Day. Song. Words by F. Vizitelli. Music by W. Meyer Lutz.

In this case the poet makes a jilted lover sing of his love and loss twenty years after the sad event, when grey hairs are on his head, and the faithless one has the children of another man around her. The circumstances are melancholy, and Herr Lutz's music, as in duty bound, is melancholy also, yet not unmixed with sweetness and tenderness. As a matter of fact, this must be accounted one of the very best songs in the Moore and Burgess repertory. It is written with the taste and skill of a musician, and no musician can hear it without approval and satisfaction.

Under the Lamp. Song. Written by Frank Stainforth. Composed by Anthony Nish.

A melancholy contrast is here shown between a group of children dancing on a village green and a drunken fellow who, when a child, danced there himself. Life is, unhappily, full of such contrasts, and there is in Mr. Stainforth's verses the force of truth if not much of a poet's afflatus. Mr. Nish's music shows his usual aptness of expression, but we would counsel him to use greater variety of rhythm. He is so fond of the "six-eight" that it is quite refreshing to meet with, as we do in this song, a few bars of "common time."

Faces vanished like a dream. Song. Words by Frank Stainforth. Music by Meyer Lutz.

This is a pretty song founded upon a subject with which all must be more or less in sympathy. The music exhibits Herr Lutz's customary taste and skill, and we must specially commend the change from four-four to three-eight time. The idea is a happy one, and very happily carried out.

Hawkes & Co.

Elegant Fantasia on Rivière's Spring Chorus. By the Chevalier A. de Kontski.

The well-known melody from Babil and Bijou is here treated in a fashion simple enough to bring it within the means of the least skilful amateur pianist. All the more difficult passages are fingered. No doubt the popularity of the theme will secure a good reception for the fantasia.

Fantasia Variée for the Pianoforte on Rivière's Spring Chorus. By Mdlle. Secretain.

This work consists of a showy introduction, the melody pure and simple, and one variation brilliant enough to satisfy modern taste for that quality. No doubt it is an effective thing in its way.

CRITICS versus AUTHORS.

(From the Liverpool "Porcupine.")

THE CRITICS' DEFENCE ASSOCIATION, LIMITED.

In 1,000 Shares of £20 each.

TRUSTEES.

The Proprietors of the Principal Metropolitan and Provincial Newspapers.

DIRECTORS.

The Editors and Contributors of the Leading Newspapers, to be annually chosen by Ballot.

The result of various actions for libel, brought during the last few years against editors and contributors to newspapers, by incompetent authors and actors, makes it apparent that prompt and strong measures must be taken to put a stop to an organized system of intimidation calculated to drive editors and newspaper proprietors to cease criticising new books, plays, and actors. This must be done, or criticism will depreciate to mere puffing. In either case, the absence from the columns of the newspapers of honest and fearless criticism will be a public misfortune, and especially injurious to literature, art, and the drama.

At present, gentlemen of experience, talent, and unblemished honour, who write honestly on new books, plays, and dramatic artists, are liable not only to be grossly insulted and libelled in the newspapers, periodicals, and pamphlets, but to be put to the expense and annoyance of legal proceedings. These actions for libel are very frequently tried before juries totally incompetent to judge of the truthfulness and value of criticism on matters of literature and art. The jurymen are—as tradesmen—as a rule, prejudiced against anyone connected with journalism.

It is therefore proposed to raise a fund to defend newspapers threatened with actions for libel by authors, managers, and dramatic or musical artists. The funds will also be used, when deemed advisable, to enter actions against such persons who publicly impeach the honour, and maliciously slander, contributors to the newspaper press.

WAIFS.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—The women are instructed in our planet as to the art of pleasing, and the handsomest and most gifted exert themselves to this end. They are required to attend to their personal appearance abroad and at home. The married especially are enjoined to attend to this as much in the presence of their husbands as before strangers. A different custom prevailed in former times, when women, after they had been some time married, thinking that their husband's affection was secured, gave themselves no further care to please him, though still taking pains to appear handsome and fascinating to others. It was for visitors and strangers that the most comely apparel and the most engaging manners were put on; the consequence was, that the husband often preferred the society of those who, in appearance at least, seemed to care more for him than did his own wife. This was the cause of much of the immorality which formerly existed in our world. The example, too, on children was most injurious; it schooled them in deceit and disingenuousness. My laws declare that those, whether man or woman, are dishonest, who wear a behaviour to each other after marriage different to what it was before, for they have gained the affections of their victim by deceit—pretending one thing and doing another.—"Another World."

Madame Camille Urso has been giving concerts in New Orleans.

Mr. C. J. Bishenden is announced to appear on the 20th and 21st inst., at the Opera Comique, Paris.

Minnie Hauck leaves the Vienna Imperial Opera House for the Comic Opera. She has signed a three year's contract.

Mr. Augustus Harris, Mr. Gye's indefatigable prime minister, has returned from Milan. Much may be expected.

Mr. Gye, having visited Milan, has left for Naples, and was to arrive in London this week. More may be expected.

A cantata by Rubinstein, founded on Goethe's Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship, has just been published in Leipsic.

Mr. Boucicault, in a speech before the curtain at Washington not very long ago said that, within thirty years, he has written more than 300 dramas.

A new sacred cantata, entitled Supplication and Praise, by Dr. Sloman, of Scarborough, is in the press, and arrangements are being made for its performance at an early date.

Mr. Hugh Brennan, the young English tenor, has appeared, under the nom de guerre of Elgo Talbo, as the "Protagonista" in M. Gounod's Faust, with great success, at Leghorn. Mr. Brennan was well known about two years ago among the "Wandering" and "Moray Minstrels."

"Mr. Alfred Baylis,"—says the Midland Herald—"made a very favourable impression in M. Gounod's song, 'Maid of Athens,' and Sir Julius Benedict's 'The Lord is very pitiful.' Mr. Baylis, we hear, had the advantage of a private rehearsal with each of the distinguished composers."

The Paris papers tell of a duel on a piano between two musicians. They played for forty-eight hours without food or drink. Having commenced with pieces of a sedate character, they passed on to waltzes, and thence to operatic music. One had played the "Miserere" in Il Trovatore five hundred and eighty times, and was commencing on the five hundred and eighty-first performance of that piece when he sank to rise no more. The other was conveyed to the hospital, his life being despaired of, and the four seconds are suffering from mental aberration.

The avidity with which the anti-theatrical audience at Bellew's readings seize upon the purely theatric features is in evidence against them. What they really long for is the theatre. But they don't know it, wont admit it. They look upon Bellew as having been won over to morality because he refuses to wear a wig, and have traps put in the platform; just as they insist that for the organist to play "Le Sabre de mon Père," instead of "Mount Vernon," when the collection is being taken up, is to win a good melody from the devil.—American Paper.

Kircher relates the following:—A venerable old priest recited, every night before retiring, the "Litany of the Saints." At the end of each verse a thin, flute-like voice was heard to respond with:—"Ora pro nobis!" The clergyman was old, and no one was admitted into his apartment at so late an hour. The mystified Kircher resolved to see the young sacristan who articulated so melodiously the response, and accordingly he concealed himself one evening in the room of the reverend old gentleman. The hour of prayer having arrived, the aged priest, kneeling before the cross, began to sing the Litany. Presently a sweet, child-like voice answered, "Ora pro nobis!" Kircher looked around him in astonishment, without being able to discover the person who responded, until at last he noticed, in the dim light, a bird seriously perched upon the stick in his cage, responding without hesitation, and in an irreproachable manner, "Ora pro nobis!"

A trio, by Brahms, for piano, violin and horn, was played recently at the evening concert of H. H. Rozsavolgyi, in Pesth, Hungary.

SOCIAL BORES.—Mr. Disraeli says, "The secret of success is to be master of your subject." There is also a negative success which betrays no ignorance and prevents ridicule, in not pretending to understand that of which you know very little, and talking dogmatically, and giving advice thereupon, as if you knew all about it. Silence betrays nothing, and listeners are always learning; but assumed knowledge and its promulgation beget contempt. The heedless braying of a certain species of humanity, combining the attributes of the magpie and the donkey, is as destructive to the happy flow of ideas and knowledge worth listening to, from those who have them to communicate, as an organ grinder in the street is to the mathematician solving his problem, or the musical composer working at his composition. There is another variety of this type of humanity with brains too shallow to receive any pleasant impressions from the performance of music. Hence they commence a conversation, or indulge their neighbours with loud remarks, presuming that they appreciate them more than the music they would willingly listen to. I remember on one occasion a specimen of this same genius embracing with avidity the opportunity of the commencement of one of Chopin's charming and dreamy compositions to put coals on the fire, thus making a rattling black diamond accompaniment, never anticipated by composer, performer, or audience. A rising like this may be pardoned from the application of such blisters as these.—From "Journal and Jottings," by H. W. G.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.

Price 12s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine, (Longman & Co.,) they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from, Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION.

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country. The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. VAN PRAAG.

MR. VAN PRAAG, who has been for many years past well known to the members of the Musical Profession, and the public, as holding a responsible position at the principal Concert-rooms of the West End, is now, in his 74th year. In addition to his failing health and strength, he has also recently become a widower, and is, by this sad bereavement, left alone, with not a relative in England to aid or take care of him. He has children in California who wish him to go out to them, and it is his own desire, notwithstanding his age and infirmities, to do so. Want of means for undertaking so long and expensive a journey, which his children are unable to supply, however, preclude the possibility of his leaving England. Under these circumstances, a few friends, well able to bear witness to his respectability, honesty, and courtesy in the discharge of the duties he has so "well and worthily fulfilled," are anxious to raise a Subscription in his behalf, to which contributions are earnestly and respectfully requested.

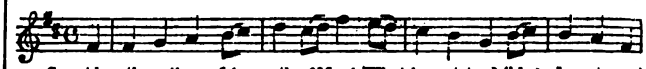
WORDS BY (SONG.) MUSIC BY

WM. HENDERSON. EMILE BERGER.



Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May! What joys at-tend thine ad-vent gay!

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May!
What joys attend thine advent gay!
On every tree the birdies sing,
From hill and dale glad echoes ring;
The lark, inspir'd, to Heav'n ascends,
The gurgling brook in beauty wends
By mossy bank and grassy brae,
Where violets bloom and lambkins play.
Delightful Spring—sweet month of May
What joys attend thine advent gay!

ANOTHER WORLD.*

(From "Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper.")

It is difficult to determine what is meant by these three hundred pages of fragments from the Star City of Montalluyah. We have thought that Hermes is a monomaniac, or that he is a powerful satirist, or that he is attempting a reproduction, in a more feasible form, of the "Arabian Nights;" and we are puzzled to decide which supposition is the correct one. In any case, this work, entitled "Another World," is a most remarkable one—full of wild ideas and strange suggestions, of philanthropic schemes and poetical description. Before, however, turning to the theory evolved in these three hundred pages, we must glance at Hermes' preface and introduction. In the opening sentences of the preface, we are reminded that the belief in a plurality of worlds is "generally maintained by modern astronomers." Hermes then proceeds to beg the reader to suspend his judgment until he has carefully examined the fragments now submitted to him. The author, or editor, as he persists in calling himself, (for he says he is not creating, imagining, but merely introducing these revelations,) will not attempt to explain the circumstances by which such extraordinary experiences were acquired; for he thinks any such attempt would increase the incredulity with which his statements will be met. At the same time he makes a promise to this effect:—

"When these revelations, or others derived from the same source, have succeeded in establishing a confidence between the editor and his readers, it is more than probable that the secret of the source itself will be disclosed. That disclosure, made in due season, will bring to light some unprecedented, but most interesting facts, and will establish the important truth, that the soul of man is immaterial and immortal."

In his introduction, the editor is careful to tell us that this new world is not a spiritual or angelic region, but simply a planet like the earth on which we live. He has reason to believe that Montalluyah (the name of the Star City), is the world known to us as the planet Mars. Indications will be found in the fragments, Hermes tells us, that will go far towards satisfying astronomical authorities of the correctness of his supposition. He had at first believed the planet to be either Venus or Mercury, but he gives good reasons why his later judgment should be better. The editor is also careful not to bind himself to the approval of all the laws and customs prevalent in Montalluyah. Although these are based on the principle of securing the greatest happiness to the greatest number, he does not think of recommending them all for adoption, anymore than he would uphold the swan-ship of Montalluyah as a model for the P. and O. Company. But he hopes that his record of the regulations of "Another World" may have a good effect, if only by calling attention to the evils which have been to a great extent remedied in Montalluyah, but which flourish luxuriantly here.

The name of Montalluyah, which more immediately belongs to the chief city in the planet, is extended so as to include the whole sphere. There are no separate countries and independent states on this earth; it forms one vast kingdom, governed by one supreme ruler, assisted by twelve inferior kings. The speaker in the autobiographical fragments was the son of one of the twelve kings, and by his worth and genius he became the Tootmanyoso, or Supreme Ruler. And now we purpose to turn to the Tootmanyoso's fragments.

The grand principle on which the Supreme Ruler works, is that prevention is better than cure, therefore he seeks to do good to the children in their earliest infancy. Some of the systems advocated with regard to the education of the young are admirable and are feasible—notably the "Amusement Gallery," to which we shall presently turn. Among the many subjects which the Tootmanyoso has successfully handled, are the following, and it must be conceded that the Tootmanyoso has done something to go on with:—

"The care and protection of woman, the development of her capabilities and graces, the preservation and increase of her beauty, marriage and its incidents. The birth, growth, and education of the future man and of the mother of men; the enlarging and ennobling the moral and intellectual powers. Preservation of health, prevention and cure of disease, prolongation of life and augmentation of the faculties of appreciation and enjoyment. The increase of our flocks and herds, and of other sources of supply for the food of man. The discovery and creation of new means of sustenance, and the amelioration of the old. The discovery of the properties of birds, beasts, fishes, insects, reptiles, and creeping things, and their application to the service of man. The invention of new instruments, the enlargement of the power of those already known, the development of electrical and mechanical powers, and the subjecting the workings of nature to the uses of man. The care and protection, in health and in sickness, of the lower orders, and of those whom nature had not qualified to take care of themselves. Occupation for all—each according to his capabilities and the bent of his genius, as ascertained and developed by education; the government of the country, the enlargement and improvement of the cities, with a view to the health, comfort, and progressive elevation of the community."

With these large schemes successfully treated, it seems to us that Montalluyah is, perhaps, only another word for Millennium. The chapters on "Character-Divers" are most interesting. The "Character-Diver" is a state official, not appointed because of his wealth and social influence—as is done more or less by the various governments of our planet—but chosen solely for his worth and aptitude, his gentleness, and knowledge of the mind and heart. His only occupation is to discover the qualities, tendencies, and incipient faults of young children, and to act accordingly; to dive, so to speak, into the inmost feelings of the child; to note the germs of evil and good, and concert measures for their eradication and development. The counsels of Tootmanyoso on the education and correction of children contain sound advice, and would be of practical use to the founders of, and teachers, in all schools and colleges—from the universities down to the small parish schools, where parents send their little ones on payment of a penny or twopence a-week. Even Mr. Gladstone's Irish University scheme might be improved by some of Tootmanyoso's suggestions.

We have neither time nor space to debate on the marvels of this extraordinary book as we could have wished; we wish, however, to give our readers a succinct idea of the curiosities of the Star City and its administration. Having spoken of the Character-Divers, we must turn briefly to the "Amusement Gallery." It is an outbuilding from the schoolhouse, and is destined for the amusement and instruction of scholars. It contains a large collection of toys adapted to all ages and dispositions; a series of musical instruments; materials for drawing, painting, modelling, and sculpture; maps, and all kinds of animals—in miniature, and collections of the live animals which are not unwieldy. For girls, all kinds of work suitable to women are exhibited, basket-work being a favourite speciality. At each stall in these galleries an intelligent person is stationed, who is an authority on the subject represented—to answer the questions of the children. The Character-Divers are conspicuous in these institutions, from whence they mostly derive their knowledge of the young idea.

This conception is by no means impracticable, and would, we believe, have a most salutary effect on the children for whom it was destined. Awaiting the advent of a Tootmanyoso of our own, we should like to see the idea put into form by some of our philanthropists.

Before leaving our readers to consider the question for themselves, it seems to us that the description which Tootmanyoso gives of the Star City will interest and please them excessively—especially when they remember that Hermes believes that we should see the City of Montalluyah exactly as it is described, could we only obtain a sufficiently powerful telescope.

Here is Tootmanyoso's own account of his vast kingdom:—

"Palaces and edifices of various forms, their gilded spires and minarets inlaid with many-coloured transparent stones which sparkle in our brilliant sun, stand on undulating sinuous ridges, peaks, and terraces, rising one above the other in endless and irregular succession. The houses are mostly curved, oval, or round. In Montalluyah straight lines are avoided. The houses are built principally with a white stone, mingled with a peculiar stone of a bright sky-blue colour, both stones repellent of heat. Gardens and verdure separate the houses one from the other. Most of the gardens are arranged in curvilinear lines, the houses being placed at the inner and central point of the inner and outer curve alternately, so that each alternate house is on the outer centre of the garden curve, and each alternate house is on the inner centre of the adjoining curve. The undulating lines of terraces are broken by gigantic masses of rock of various colours—red, green, golden, white, blue, silver, brown, and variegated; rocks of carbuncle, lapizlazuli, malachite, gold stone, and many-coloured marbles. These rocks and undulations are intersected by ravines, rivers, inlets of the sea, lakes, and cataracts; reflecting the many tints of the gorgeously-coloured sky and the rays of our vividly-bright sun, filling our city, as it were, with aureoles of glory. In many parts the sea has made itself a hidden way, and run its course for miles under the rocks, appearing again at great distances in one of the interior inland cities, perhaps at the bottom of a deep ravine or open space; and the waters are often raised and collected for use and ornament in fountains and artificial cascades called waterlifts; whilst springs of fresh water gush out of the rocks, affording refreshment to the sun-parched and many-coloured grasses, flowers, and vegetation. Great cataracts and artificial cascades often form the background to a great building or colossal statue. The effect of these large masses of water, viewed from all parts, is extremely grand and beautiful. Sometimes the ravines, rivers, cataracts, and sea-arms are passed by huge bridges of the natural rocks, perforated by the sea, or opened by man to render navigation possible. Sometimes bridges, miles in length, are thrown across a great cataract or immense chasm, where the rocks have been relentlessly torn asunder by the lightning and other electrical disturbances. All the large bridges are covered with houses and gardens which at a distance seem air-suspended cities, hanging without support over rivers, cataracts, large cities, and aggregations of houses."

Another World; or, Fragments from the Star City of Montalluyah.* Hermes. London: Samuel Tinsley. 1873.

Digitized by Google

Having read this glowing description of the Star City, we can only say—that if Hermes has the exclusive right of information from the Tootmanyoso, at least he will share with the public his knowledge, when it is acquired, of the way to another world. If Tootmanyoso's ingenuity, or Hermes' learning, can find a method for transmitting copy from one planet to another, surely some further experiments may be tried, and a passenger route to Mars inaugurated!

Whatever we may think of Hermes' strange theory—and we will not give a deliberate judgment until we have heard the source of his "revelations"—we cannot deny the force and power of his work. If this book be, as we believe, not the result of a monomania, but the flight of a wild fancy—the freak of a keen imagination, then Hermes is destined to hold a high place in contemporary literature. His description of the Mountain Supporter, taken singly, would win him a place as an imaginative writer of striking talent. If, however, Hermes wishes us to believe his strange asseverations, and to believe in his sound belief also, then we can only say that we are sorry for it—that we are a practical people as a rule, and we want a proof!

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The prospectus of the approaching season at Covent Garden has appeared, and, while many Opera frequenters have eagerly scanned the list of engagements, many more have turned with keen interest to the list of promised works. Remembering that Mr. Gye succeeded in producing two new operas last year, and remembering, also, the increasingly great attention bestowed upon Herr Wagner's music, it was expected with some confidence that he would make another effort to put Lohengrin on the stage. In the prospectus of 1872 Mr. Gye said, "the presentation of one of Herr Wagner's productions to his subscribers should no longer be delayed," and that he had determined to produce Lohengrin as soon as it was possible to complete the rehearsals. But a fatality seems to attend Wagnerian music in England. A few years ago, when only "advanced" amateurs took an interest in the subject, the German master's operas were promised season after season. Now, when everybody, under the stimulus of special circumstances, is concerned to know more about them, even the promise of their production is withdrawn. Herr Wagner will have to build his own theatre in England, as he is doing at Bayreuth, before a hearing for his music can be gained. Let him come amongst us, and opponents will vie with friends in efforts to bring about an event which has tantalisingly loomed in the future during many years, and yet seems as far off as ever. Though Lohengrin is absent from Mr. Gye's prospectus, its place is not vacant, nor is it poorly filled. At the head of the list of promised operas stands Verdi's Ernani, which has not been heard in London for several years, and is certainly interesting enough to justify revival. The prospectus announces its contemplated performance as "for the first time at the Royal Italian Opera;" nevertheless, there is a record of its production in April, 1855, when Signor Graziani made his début in the part of Don Carlos. Les Diamans de la Couronne, promised, if we mistake not, at both houses last year, but given at neither, follows Ernani; and after Auber's charming opera comes Verdi's Luisa Miller, a work produced at Naples in 1849, and now to to be first heard at Covent Garden. The drama with which Signor Camarrana supplied Verdi in this instance may not be the most agreeable; but the music, marked, as it is, by the Italian master's most Italian style, deserves a chance of winning English favour. A greater novelty than either of the foregoing will be Ponchielli's I Promessi Sposi—one of four operas founded upon the same Italian romance. Mr. Gye states that this work has lately been given, "with great éclat," at Milan—a fact able, no doubt, to explain why it has arrested attention now, after being overlooked by English managers for seventeen years. Last—but far from least—the prospectus informs us that Rossini's Moïse is to be revived, with new scenery, costumes, and decorations. Should this event actually take place, it alone will serve to distinguish the season, the more because Moïse was last heard in England so long ago that to very many it will come as a perfect novelty, the familiar "Prayer" excepted. That when it does come it will have a hearty welcome need scarcely be said. As a sequel to the foregoing remarks, we may call attention to a fact not overlooked by Mr. Gye, which is, that the Covent Garden repertory now includes forty-four operas, all available for presentation in the most complete form.

Turning to the list of artists, a host of well-known names meet the eye. Mdme. Adelina Patti, who is a host in herself, comes back to us fresh from brilliant triumphs in the Russian capital—triumphs the more significant because gained in spite of formidable rivalry. The gifted lady is announced to appear in three new characters; the Caterina of Les Diamans de la Couronne, the Elvira of Ernani, and the Louisa Miller of Verdi's Neapolitan opera. As regards all of these, it is safe to prophesy that Mdme. Patti will use them to display new and striking phases of the remarkable genius with which she is endowed. Mdme. Pauline Lucca also returns from regions where she has been gathering fame and dollars. In the parts now identified with her name Mdme. Lucca is unequalled, and our Italian stage would suffer one of the greatest possible calamities were she to quit it even for a season. This event Mr. Gye seems to have had reason to dread, and even now he fears the prospective loss, for a time at least, of Mdme. Patti's services, owing to the "perfectly fabulous offers" of American managers. That he should speak in very earnest terms about such an occurrence is natural, and every Opera-goer will echo his sentiment, that to take Alabama damages is to take trash, but that to filch our prime donne is to leave us poor indeed. The numerous admirers of Mdlle. Albani are promised the rentrée of that young artist, who has, since last year, been gaining experience at the Théâtre Italien, no doubt with results in proportion to her unquestionable intelligence and keen musical instincts. Mdlle. Albani's performances are certain to be watched with great interest, as well as with an earnest desire that the promise of her first efforts may have full fruition. The Canadian lady will appear as Ophelia in Hamlet, having studied the part under M. Thomas's personal guidance, and she is also announced to assume the chief rôle in I Promessi Sposi. Beside the three prime donne, the list of known artists includes Mesdames Smeroschi, Scalchi, Monbelli, Sinico, Saar, Corsi, and Dell' Anesi; MM. Nicolini, Bettini, Urio, Marino, Rossi, Graziani, Cotogni, Bagagiolo, Ciampi, Capponi, Tagliafico, Raguar, Fallar, and M. Faure. But not even this formidable array of talent satisfies Mr. Gye, and he speaks of a recent journey to Italy for the purpose of discovering whether that land of song contained any young aspirants who might fairly be regarded as "objects of great sympathy and interest to all those who take any pleasure in watching the progress of the lyric drama." Every well-wisher to benevolent enterprise will gladly learn that Mr. Gye discovered no fewer than twelve such "objects," all of whom will make their début in the course of the season, and for whose youth and inexperience the director asks a generous allowance. Whether the subscribers take much interest in young artists, as such, may be open to question; but there can be no dispute as to the desirableness of encouraging them when they give promise of future excellence.

There only remains to add that the musical conductors will again be Signor Vianesi and Signor Bevignani; that the stage management will again be in the experienced and able hands of Mr. Augustus Harris; that the orchestra will maintain its high reputation, and that the chorus has been chosen from the best Italian sources. It is incidentally mentioned that the successful Floral Hall Concerts are to be repeated this year, under the direction of Sir Julius Benedict.

EARLY RISING AT BOARDING SCHOOLS.

(From "Another World.")

In consequence of the warmth of our climate, girls, being naturally rather luxurious, are not inclined to rise early. They are, however, all required to rise at the same hour, and this is the mode adopted for rousing them. At the end of each room, opposite to the sleeping couch, is a kind of gong made of metal and formed like a pair of cymbals, united at the base by a hinge, and kept together by a bolt at the top. At the hour of rising these cymbals are set in motion by the matron in the watch room, who touches a spring by which the bolt fastening the cymbals together is removed. Thereupon the cymbals immediately clash together, and produce loud discordant sounds. The girl, not liking the discordant noise, loses no time in stopping it, which is beyond her power unless she leaves her bed and fixes the bolt that keeps the two cymbals together. This done, she goes into an adjoining room, in which is a bath and other preparations for her ablutions. The door communicating with the sleeping room closes of itself, whereupon the matron enters the apartment, pulls off the bed clothes, and opens a large skylight at the top, to admit the fresh air.

SIR ROBERT STEWART'S LECTURES ON MUSIC.

(From the "Dublin Express.")

On the day when Sir Robert Stewart delivered the sixth and last of his interesting lectures on "The Music of Ireland," the Examination Hall was quite full. After a sketch of the life of the Irish bard, Carolan (1670—1738), illustrated with two airs, "Bumper Squire Jones" and "The Receipt," Sir Robert proceeded to deal with the saying of Moore, that "most of the known Irish airs should only be referred to the period of the eighteenth century." That assertion had been proved unfounded by Bunting, Petrie, and O'Curry. The earliest published collections of Irish music were those of Burke Thumoth and Neal, A.D. 1720; Carolan's son, 1747; and Bunting, 1796. The first three had been only adapted for flute or violin; and, although Bunting's first collection was set for keyed instruments, the want of words prevented any of the four from attaining popularity. He (the lecturer) believed it was Stevenson who first suggested to Moore the adaptation of words to the tunes. These appeared in 1808. Most of the airs were taken, without acknowledgment, from the collection of Bunting, at which Bunting was naturally angry. The success of the new melodies was unprecedented; they not only became popular at home, but even made their way into the drawing-rooms of the middle and upper classes of England, amongst whom it was the fashion at that time to regard Ireland as a country of barbarians, without a history or any traditions of art. Bunting saw his error, and endeavoured to amend it in his second collection, published in 1809, which had words adapted to some of the airs, by Tom Campbell, Miss Balfour, Dr. Drennan, and others. But whatever the merits of Bunting's poems, they proved unequal to cope with Moore, whose collections continued to increase in popularity, while Bunting's volumes remained unsold. Bunting always complained that Moore and Stevenson had mutilated the airs; but he (Sir R. Stewart), after a careful examination, had failed to detect more tampering with them than might be laid to the charge of others. For example, in Bunting's own second volume there had appeared a mutilated version of "The valley lay smiling before me" ("Colleen dhas"), which had been given in its purity in the previous volume. The chief character of the air consisted in its close adherence to the Doric scale, which Bunting's second version destroyed. Nor had modern editors behaved much better, since even Balfe's edition of "Remember the glories" ("Molly M'Alpine") mutilated the second bar in a most unaccountable manner, which destroyed its character. Most persons who endeavoured to write down airs from the singing, playing, or whistling of the peasantry failed for want of skill, scarcely one in fifty being capable. Should this be doubted, he (Sir R. Stewart) would undertake to prove that the faculty of writing down music correctly from hearing was far more rare than was generally believed. That excellent, temperate, and truthful chronicler, Dr. Petrie, declared that even Bunting's memoranda, consisting of dots, without tails, indications of key, time, or accent, were not only (as Bunting boasted) unintelligible to others, but (as Dr. Petrie believed) were so to that collector himself. Nor had Bunting much guarantee for the correctness of his assistants, even supposing his own accuracy assured. Yet he had been rash enough to assert, in his third volume (A.D. 1840), that "once a tune was impressed upon the popular ear it never varied"—an opinion proved to be unsound by two or more versions of the same airs in that very collection. [Examples were here given of two different versions of "Molly dear," and "The red-haired girl."] Perhaps there had never been any Irish song more forcibly impressed upon the popular ear than Samuel Lover's "Rory O'More," which, in the days of his (the lecturer's) boyhood, was sung, piped, or whistled by almost every one, and which, even now, would be familiar to three out of every four in the large assemblage he had the honour of addressing. He would play for them a version of this air, which, ludicrous as it was, he had heard played upon one of Halliday's Kent-bugles, by the conductor of a public conveyance on the Newbridge Road. [The melody in its mutilated state was then played by the lecturer, and received with hearty laughter.] That circumstance seemed to Sir R. Stewart conclusive upon the question of the purity of musical tradition. However, their dissent from the theory of Bunting must not make them forgetful of the services he rendered to Irish musical art. Bunting was born in 1773; his father was an English engineer, who came over to superintend the collieries at Dungannon. The musical skill of his son, Edward, had caused the youth to be chosen to reduce to notation the airs from the playing of the Irish harpers assembled at Belfast in 1792. Previous meetings had been held at Granard, in the county of Longford. The Belfast meeting, far better organised, was attended by Dennis Hempson (who had once played for the Pretender, and died in 1807, at the age of 112), Arthur O'Neill, and eight other performers. It was remarked that Hempson (alias A'Hampsy) produced his tone unlike the harpists of our day, catching the string between the nails (suffered to grow long for the purpose) and the fleshy part of the fingers, thereby fulfilling the description of the Irish harpers left by Giraldus, A.D. 1146, and of Galileo (father of the celebrated astronomer), A.D. 1581. Nothing could exceed the enthusiasm which continued to animate Edward Bunting during the half century from 1792 to 1843, when he died, and was buried at Mount Jerome, near Dublin, without even the tribute of a newspaper paragraph. Sir R. Stewart then referred to the various scales in which Irish airs were composed, the harp being tuned for G, yet used in regular series of octaves, G to G, A to A, D to D, and E to E, represented in a diagram upon the adjoining wall. He also alluded to the scale 1, 2, 3—5, 6—8, by some persons deemed chiefly to characterize Irish melody. The latter was the Chinese scale, as used for tuning the "scholar's lute," and was the scale of the Irish air, "I'd mourn the hopes that leave me." Of this scale the modern pianoforte répertoire furnished an interesting example. (Here a lady amateur performed brilliantly the étude of Chopin in G flat major, from the treble part of which the 4th and 7th notes of the scale had been absolutely excluded.) The harp, long the chief instrument of the educated classes in ancient Ireland, had but one drawback—its scale, once fixed, could with difficulty be altered; nor was it till Erard's improvements (for which the earliest patent was granted in 1794) that all the semitones were practicable. From this limitation of the scale had arisen most of the peculiarities which distinguished Irish airs. Moore remarked this, but did not trace it to the true cause. The air, "Oh! think not my spirits are always as light" (John O'Reilly, the Active) was a rare example of a different tuning of semitones in each octave. Doubtless, too, these semitones were sometimes changed by singers and fiddlers, just as the Gregorian scales were formerly modified in actual use, and continue to be so in the Russo-Greek Church to this day. Some other peculiarities of Irish melodies were then pointed out: one being the most general type of airs, like "Gramachree," "Byrne of Ballymanus," and the "Dawning of the day," from Dr. Joyce's new and excellent collection: they consisted of four strains, the first tending downwards to the key-note; the second in the upper octave, mostly ending upon the fifth; the third closely resembling the second; and the fourth a return to the first. This structure had been remarked so long ago as 1816, in the Dublin Examiner. Bunting had advanced another theory—that the presence of the major 6th marked the airs of Ireland; but in this Sir R. Stewart could not concur, since that note was equally prominent in "Jock o' Hazeldean," in "Coming thro' the rye," and in "Auld lang syne." Some examples were given of Irish tunes terminating on the fifth of the scale, like "Come, send round the wine," also of tunes without any ending, also of that "narrative form" of three reiterated notes, which Moore and Stevenson had destroyed in "The last rose of Summer"—in "St. Senanus," and in "Go where glory waits thee," to the detriment of all those airs; which, according to Petrie and Bunting, the peasantry had almost failed to recognize, in the new form. An interesting example of the transformation of "'Twas Jack the jolly ploughboy," to "Farewell, but whenever you welcome the hour," was found in the singing of one of the children of the chapel, and of a lady amateur; and many instances were cited by Sir Robert, in which Moore had omitted one or two bars, and sometimes whole strains, from "Fly not yet," from "Let Erin remember," and other airs. The lecture, which occupied about an hour and a quarter, and was heard with eager interest, terminated with a sketch of the volunteer movement of 1782, and a performance of the quick-step used by the citizen soldiery of that period, one of the drums employed being of similar date. This had been lent for the purpose by Rev. John MacMahon.

ITALIAN POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—On Monday morning last, at a place 30 miles south of Ancona, I read The Times of the Saturday previous. The paper was brought by a gentleman who had left London by the morning mail train on the day of its publication, and was, therefore, 48 hours in reaching Ancona. I have lately been staying at Milan. My letters were never delivered there until about 9 o'clock in the evening of the third day after that on which they were posted in London—that is, a letter posted in London on a Monday afternoon was not delivered in Milan until the following Thursday at 9 p.m., being 72 hours on the road; and yet Milan is about 250 English miles nearer London than is Ancona. If you can find space for this statement it may serve to draw the attention of the London Post Office authorities to the subject. I find that the practice of giving receipts for money paid for the transmission of telegrams, and also that of requiring receipts on their delivery, is in full force in Italy. When may we expect it to be so in England? Your obedient servant,

FREDERICK GYE.

MR. WALTER BACHE'S CONCERT.

(From the "Daily News.")

The ninth annual recurrence of this event took place on Friday evening week, when, as for several years past, the arrangements were such as to give the concert a speciality and importance far above ordinary occasions of the kind. Mr. Bache is one of those—and there are many—who advocate the claims of Franz Liszt to be considered as a great composer, in addition to his more widely recognised title to rank as a great pianist. Mr. Bache has not been content with passive advocacy, but has bestowed unwearying care and large outlay in the presentment, for the first time in this country, of some elaborate works by Liszt. At his concert in 1871, Mr. Bache produced Les Préludes, No. 5 of the orchestral suite entitled Symphonische Dichtungen. At last year's concert this movement was repeated, and No. 7 (Fest Klänge) from the same series was given.

Friday night week's programme brought forward another of Liszt's most important compositions, previously unheard in England—his setting of the 13th Psalm for tenor solo, chorus, and orchestra. As in previous instances, a full and efficient band (numbering 83 performers) was engaged, largely composed of members of the Crystal Palace orchestra, together with a chorus of 130 voices. The concert commenced with the beautiful march and chorus, "Twine ye the garlands," from Beethoven's music to the Ruins of Athens; and this was followed by the air, "If b'er the cruel tyrant," from Arne's Artaxerxes, nicely sung by Miss Georgina Maudsley. After this came one of the specialities of the evening, although not a novelty, Schumann's pianoforte concerto, played by Mr. Walter Bache, whose several past fine performances were at least equalled, if not surpassed, on this occasion. In brilliancy of execution—especially in the extreme mechanical difficulties of the final movement—and in intellectual comprehension of the spirit of the work throughout, Mr. Bache's playing was alike worthy of the special demonstration of applause which followed the close of the concerto, and brought the pianist again to the platform in acknowledgment. Up to this point Mr. Manns, of the Crystal Palace, had directed the orchestra, which was afterwards conducted by Mr. Bache.

A clever song, "A Chain," by Mr. Deichmann, was sung, with good appreciation of its declamatory style, by Mr. Henry Guy (of the Royal Academy of Music), accompanied on the pianoforte by Dr. Heap, and this led to the Psalm by Liszt, already referred to, which was given with an English text, adapted from the German version by Julia Goddard. The tenor solo passages, expressive of the Psalmist's supplications, which run throughout the work—sometimes with, sometimes without, chorus—were sung with earnest attention by Mr. Guy. The Psalm occasionally displays that bold, not to say defiant, opposition to conventional form and structure that characterizes all Liszt's important works. Still, although there are some portions that, on a first hearing, appear crude and even wild, there are others in which coherent thought and mastery are at once apparent; such as the contrapuntal writing in the orchestral prelude to the choral movement, beginning "Wie lange soll ich sorgen," and the Fugato, which forms the first announcement of the closing portion, "Ich will dem Herrn singen," the theme having previously been prominently used in other movements. Very striking is the effect of calm interposed, at the words commencing "Schaune doch" ("Hearken now") between the contest and turbulence of the music immediately preceding and following. As an instance of sustained melody, full of grace and beauty, we would point to the movement commencing with tenor solo, "Ich habe hoffe," followed by the entry of the chorus with the same strain, and supported by some rich orchestration, in which the following passages for violins are prominent features. Indeed, throughout the work the instrumentation is especially elaborate and important. Whatever difference of opinion might have existed among the audience as to the merits of the Psalm, there appeared to be none as to those of the "Chorus of Reapers," No. 4 of the movements supplied by Liszt to Herder's Prometheus. A short orchestral introduction—in which the wood wind instruments are used with well contrasted effect, supported by a prevailing "drone" base—leads to some charming choral writing; in which melodious phrases, full of genial and pastoral character, occur alternately in the different divisions of the choir, and in combined harmony, supported by light and fanciful instrumentation. The effect produced by this piece was so great that it had to be repeated. But little space remains to speak of another novelty at Mr. Bache's concert—Richard Wagner's "Huldigung's Marsch," a piece composed for performance on the occasion of the present King of Bavaria's accession to the throne. The score presents those multiplied details which Wagner employs in his orchestral writing; and the effect of the march is imposing and well fitted to serve as an accessory in State ceremonials.

A fresh paragraph—although a short one—must be devoted to a recognition of the charming singing of Miss Sophie Ferrari in the canzonetta, "Pur dicesti," of the old Italian composer, Lotti. This was given with a freshness of voice and a refined taste that drew forth warm and universal applause.

Mr. Bache deserves the thanks of all who are interested in the music of the new German school—even of those who are adverse—for the opportunity afforded by him of hearing specimens of it which might have otherwise been ignored here.

MADAME SCHUMANN'S RECITALS.

According to her annual custom, Madame Schumann—whose brilliant reception at the Monday Popular Concerts, on the occasion of her first appearance for the season, was described not long since—gave two pianoforte recitals on her own account. At the first, on Wednesday week, in St. James's Hall, the accomplished lady began with her late husband's "Etudes en forme de Variations," which Schumann dedicated to "son ami William Sterndale Bennett," who, in return, dedicated to Schumann his own admirable Fantasia in A major. The original title of the piece, which stands as Op. 13 in the published compositions of the master, was "Douze Etudes Symphoniques." A more trying and difficult work of its kind can scarcely be named. There are twelve variations, all constructed upon a very singular theme, confided, it is said, to Schumann by an amateur; and the whole takes up a good half-hour in performance. Nevertheless, difficult as are the variations, which tax the powers of the executant more and more severely as one succeeds another, Madame Schumann plays them from beginning to end without book, and plays them superbly—as, indeed, she does whatever proceeded from the pen of her husband, whose music lies as deep in her heart as it flows readily under her hands. Admirable as is her interpretation of the music of other masters, she is never, in our opinion, so entirely herself, so beyond all rivalry, as in that of Schumann, whose spirit seems to breathe through her fingers. Many would, therefore, have liked more of Schumann than was contained in the programme of Wednesday week's recital; and, in fact, if the entire selection had been made out of Schumann's works, vocal and instrumental, not a soul in the room would have complained. As it happened, the only other excerpts from the same source were three fancy pieces—"Aufschwung" ("Soaring"), "Warum" ("Why"), from Op. 12; and Scherzino, from Op. 26—each attractive in its way, each, it is almost superfluous to add, given in perfection, but each, to a certain extent, familiar. Madame Schumann vouchsafed no more.

Among other compositions brought forward by the gifted pianist was J. S. Bach's so called "Italiänisches Concert" (Italian Concerto), which Kuhnau, a contemporary of Bach's, styled simply "Klavier-Sonate," and which, if it really did emanate from the genius of Bach, a fact that some in the face of traditional quasi-authority deny, is comparatively one of the least important works of its kind with which that most learned, ingenious, and profound of musicians is accredited. It was played, however, in such a style as to win a "recall" for the player, who earned further honours in a Notturno by Chopin, and a couple of Schubert's charming "Momens Musicals," the last of which (in F minor) was encored. These also Madame Schumann performed without book.

The remaining pieces were the Adagio from Spohr's Ninth Violin Concerto, very cleverly executed (and with deserved success) by Mdlle. Friese, well accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Sauerbrey, who also accompanied Madame Sauerbrey in songs by Gounod and Schubert. Madame Sauerbrey possesses an agreeable contralto voice, and sings with feeling. The concert afforded general satisfaction, and Madame Schumann can hardly fail to have been gratified by the hearty manner in which her own contributions to the programme were appreciated.

Moscow.—Madame Mallinger has appeared only as Valentine in Les Huguenots without making any very great impression. M. Naudin, on the contrary, was much applauded as Raoul. The same is true of Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, whose impersonation of Dinorah, in Meyerbeer's opera of that name, proved a great hit.—The programme of the seventh concert given by the Russian Musical Society contained the following pieces:—Overture to Coriolan, Beethoven; Concerto for Violoncello (A minor), Schumann; Air, "Ah, Perfido," Beethoven; Fantasia for Violoncello, Servais; Songs, Rubinstein and Glinka; and Symphony, No. 2, C minor, Tschaikowsky. Mozart's Requiem was to be performed with a monster chorus during Lent. The solo singers were to be Mdme. Alexandrowa, Mdlle. Leonkowa, MM. Dadonoff and Demidoff.—At the Operahouse, Seroff's opera, Rognada, was given for the benefit of Mdme. Gonerć, who, besides being overwhelmed, à la Russe, with choice exotics, in the shape of bouquets and garlands, received gifts to the value of 10,000 silver roubles.—Russian composers are very active just now. Among the new operas may be mentioned Opritschniki, by Tschaikowsky; The Dweller at Pskow, Rimski-Korsakoff; Boris Godunoff, Mussorsky; and Elias Muromets, J. Schramek.

Cairo.—Signor Mongini is re-engaged for next season at the Vice-Regal Theatre.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

Pursuing its annual course of familiar work, this society gave, on Friday evening, a performance of Handel's Samson, the oratorio which immediately followed the Messiah, and, like it, was written in an incredibly short space of time. The Messiah, for reasons connected with its subject, and the character of its music, has taken first rank; but the history of Samson fully justifies Handel's esteem for the work. It is said that the master could hardly decide which was the better of the two; and, though proofs are abundant that an author's opinion of his own productions is far from conclusive as to their merits, the verdict of every generation since Handel's time has given Samson a place only a little inferior to that of its illustrious forerunner. The reasons for this are not far to seek, some of them being readily found in the nature of the story, and in the fact that the chief personages excite a sympathetic feeling. Who can refuse an interest in the Israelitish hero, once so powerful and so feared, now blind, a prisoner, and the sport of his enemies? Manoah, too, the father of Samson, bowed down with sorrow for his champion son; Micah, the faithful friend; and even Harapha, the blustering but chivalric Philistine—all these are real personages, whose progress through the drama commands attention. Moreover, the story of Samson, as abridged at Exeter Hall, is dramatically told, and steadily gathers force till the tremendous climax is reached. But, after all, the chief charm lies in music which shows Handel at his best. Every character introduced has one or more important airs, and the choruses are a succession of "thunderbolts," to use the term by which Beethoven described the master's forceful strokes. Were it necessary to do so, we might go step by step through Samson, and find everywhere evidence of surpassing genius. But the necessity does not exist; witness, in proof, the fact that Exeter Hall last Friday evening was crammed to repletion by an audience who heard the work with the genuine interest which can only spring from true appreciation.

A performance by the Sacred Harmonic Society rarely calls for lengthened description. The music is, as a rule, quite familiar, and not less familiar, owing to an exceedingly limited repertory, is the manner of its rendering. Not much need be said, therefore, about Friday night's doings. As on former occasions, the concerted pieces were given with all the imposing grandeur which power and energy can call forth. The deepest impression was created in the fine fugal chorus, "Then shall they know;" the splendid finale to the first part, "Then round about the starry throne;" the double chorus, "Fixed in His everlasting seat;" and the jubilant outburst of Philistine gladness, "Great Dagon has subdued our foe." In all these—not to speak of others scarcely less noteworthy—the executive resources controlled by Sir Michael Costa were used to full advantage. The solo-singing was unequal, but much of it deserved high praise. Among the successes we must place "Return, O God of Hosts," and "Ye sons of Israel," as rendered by Madame Patey, whose style in sacred music is now worthy of her fine natural gifts, and justly entitles her to that place in the front rank of oratorio artists which she so soon reached. Mr. Cummings, the locum tenens of Mr. Sims Reeves, was painstaking and artistic, as usual, in a very trying part. The tenor who essays the music of Samson needs all the excellence traditionally associated with Mr. Beard, for whom it was written; and he needs, further, a combination of favourable circumstances as to voice and energy not always enjoyed. Hence, there is small reason for wonder at the fact that the representatives of the Israelitish champion sometimes fall below the strict requirements of their part. Mr. Cummings is far from being the least successful among those representatives, seeing that whatever he attempts is carried out with the skill and taste of a thorough musician. Mr. Santley appeared as Harapha, and it may readily be imagined with what splendid effect he delivered the Philistine's airs, "Honour and arms" and "Presuming slave." His singing of both was masterly in the extreme—a perfect example of Handelian work; that it was applauded as such everybody will assume. Mr. Lewis Thomas, to whom fell the part of Manoah, must be specially commended for his delivery of the old man's pathetic music. In the episode of "Thy glorious deeds," beginning "To sorrow now I tune my song," and, especially in "How willing my paternal love," Mr. Thomas exhibited true feeling, and thus satisfied the greatest as well as the most difficult requirement. Mr. Montem Smith did good service in his small part; and the soprano airs were entrusted, for reasons which were not strikingly obvious, to Mdlle. Carola. Sir Michael Costa conducted in his usual manner.

Rossini's Stabat Mater and Mendelssohn's Lobgesang are to form the next programme, the directors having again put off the duty of attending to those unfamiliar works which were promised in the scheme of the season.

CARLSRUHE.—Signor Pollini's Italian Operatic company have given a very successful series of performances at the Grand Ducal Theatre.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

On Wednesday week, the members of the Royal Albert Hall Amateur Orchestral Society gave a second entertainment to their friends and such of the public as chose to procure tickets by a slightly circuitous route. The attendance was large and fashionable, and the concert appeared to excite a genuine interest—not merely that dictated by politeness. Beethoven's Symphony in C (No. 1), which headed the programme, tested severely the skill of the orchestra—more severely, perhaps, than was quite consistent with prudence. But the work was "pulled through" fairly well, the amateurs labouring at their task with an earnestness and zeal indicative of better results by-and-bye. Cherubini's fine overture to Anacreon was also given, as was the equally fine, though very different overture, to Guillaume Tell. Rossini's work showed the orchestra to greater advantage than anything else; the first violoncello was admirably played in the opening movement, and elicited applause that had a ring in it suggestive of something more than the conventional "Thank you" which forms the amateur's usual reward. The March in Athalie closed the programme. We must look upon the performance of the Duke of Edinburgh's Galatea waltz in the light of a special proceeding, intended, doubtless, as a compliment to his Royal Highness, and not as an indication that the society means to devote a portion of its energies to dance music. So regarded, no stickler for high art could quarrel with the enthusiastic reception the waltz obtained. Besides, it is a good thing of its kind. Its themes are really pretty, and, well scored for the orchestra, it made an effect which caused lovers of the dance to look longingly at the unoccupied arena. So persistently was the waltz applauded that its Royal composer came to the front of the platform, fiddle in hand, and bowed his acknowledgments; after which a portion was repeated. The vocalists were Miss Mary Hobbs, Mrs. Stretton, and Mr. Sydney Sprague. Miss Hobbs sang "O mio Fernando," and an effective composition by Lady Clarence Paget, with considerable taste and skill. She is evidently a young artist of promise, who should be encouraged to persevere in studies already turned to good account. Mr. Arthur Sullivan conducted the orchestral performances.

A remark upon the violin solo played by Mr. Enthoven, the society's chef d'attaque, should have a place to itself. This gentleman could not more conclusively have proved a right to the position he occupies; his performance of David's variations on Le Petit Tambour being remarkable for a command over the instrument which entitles him to high distinction.

MUNICH.—Herr Huber, who, a short since, left his place in a Government office to become a first tenor at the Royal Operahouse, has returned to his official stool and desk, in virtue of a stipulation that, if he did not choose to remain on the stage, he should be at liberty to resume his former position. He was not unsuccessful as a singer, but his figure was far from elegant, or calculated to represent romantic young heroes and lovers. A Dr. Krückl, from the Stadttheater, Augsburg, will, it is said, if competent, be engaged in his place.—Madame Mallinger has left for good. Her engagement expired on the 1st inst. She is by no means regretted, as her caprices and whims have, it is asserted, gone far in estranging the public from her.

MILAN.—A fire broke out lately at the Scala, but, fortunately, without doing much mischief. During the last act of Un Ballo in Maschera, Signora Paoletti, a danseuse, while dressing in her room, approached too nearly with a light a heap of clothes belonging to herself and four companions. The clothes caught fire, and in almost less than no time the flames destroyed everything in the room. The engines were quickly brought into play, and, after some time, extinguished the flames, but not before 70 dresses, worn in the two ballets of the season, and Robert le Diable, were utterly consumed.—Signor Ciniselli has obtained the consent of the Corporation to build a new circus, near the Porta Tenaglia. The circus is to contain 4,000 persons.

STUTTGARDT.—On receiving intelligence of the death of the celebrated Pischek, the king immediately sent to express his sympathy with the family of the deceased. The funeral was attended by a large concourse of people, anxious to pay the last sad tribute of respect to one who had for so many years been an ornament of the Royal Opera. A long line of carriages and pedestrians slowly wound its way, at three o'clock p.m., on the 19th February, from the Königsthor, and through the Königsstrasse to the Fangelsbach Cemetery. At its head was carried (after the Roman Catholic fashion) a cross, to which were attached long streamers, with a laurel wreath hanging between. The coffin, covered with flowers, followed. All classes were numerously represented on the occasion.

BREMEN.—Herr Max Bruch's last work, Odysseus, has been successfully executed by the Singacademie, under the direction of the composer. The two principal solo parts of Odysseus (Ulysses), and Penelope, were sung by Herr Schelper and Mdlle. Keller, both of the Stadttheater.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 15, 1873.

SOME years ago there were two witnesses in England who annually gave evidence as to the effect of a musical religious service on what may be called a grand scale. In London the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy worshipped beneath the dome of St. Paul's, to the sound of many instruments besides the organ, and in the country, the Festival of the Three Choirs was always opened with a solemn performance of the Dettingen Te Deum. But these witnesses stood alone, lifting up their voice in vain to a world which was quite satisfied with the old humdrum procedure. In time even their voices became silent. The Corporation dismissed their fiddlers and trumpeters, and the Festival chose to do nothing of a special character for which it could not demand concert prices. Then, all over England, humdrum had its way. Here an organ and a perfunctory paid choir; there an organ and an earnest but incompetent choir of volunteers—beyond which, nothing. It is an old saying, that "when things come to the worst they must mend;" and what could be worse, from the standpoint of religious æsthetics, than a state of things which refused the use of the highest artistic means in the services of the Church? But it was only a few years back that signs of a change appeared. Certain churches, aiming at an ornate musical ritual, introduced the harp; and that most ancient of sacred instruments seems to have opened the door for others which could not boast an equal prescriptive right of entry. At length came the now historical performance of Bach's Matthew Passion in Westminster Abbey, under the auspices of Dean Stanley and the conductorship of Mr. Barnby, who has already done enough to make his mark upon the history of English religious music. This performance signalized the beginning of a new state of things; and, since then we have heard and looked upon a surpliced orchestra playing in the Metropolitan cathedral; while the historic fane of Canterbury, not to speak of others less illustrious, have witnessed oratorio music properly performed within its venerable walls. It remained, however, for a parish church to show whether work of such a high character could be achieved apart from the exceptional resources and the great prestige of a cathedral. The distinction of doing this has fallen upon St. Anne's, Soho. Soho is not a fashionable region, nor are its thoroughfares great arteries of traffic; so that, in all probability, few of our readers know anything about its churches. St. Anne's is not a specially striking object to wayfarers who hurry through the "foreign quarter." It stands back from the narrow street, surrounded by a dismal graveyard, and by no means courts observation. Yet, as just said, it has gained distinction; for within its walls, every Friday evening, throughout this present Lenten season, is performed, with all needful appliances of voices, organ, and orchestra, the John Passion of the immortal old Leipsic Cantor. Of course, the work is done upon a modest scale, as befits the modest edifice; but excellence and pretentiousness are not inseparable things. Here, at all events, with a small choir, and a small band, Bach's music may be heard in a very satisfactory degree of perfection. Some of the airs are of course omitted, but the ensemble is good, and anyone who attends these Friday evening services may truly say that he has heard the Passion to advantage. Why St. Anne's enjoys the honour of such an attraction is at once explained when we state that Mr. Barnby acts as organist of the church. To his initiative the whole thing is due, and to his energy and skill the performance owes its merits.

We do not mean to discuss the John Passion here, especially as a word may more profitably be said with regard to the effect of its performance in Soho. It was our good fortune to attend on one occasion; and our good fortune, also, to note the profound attention paid by a crowded congregation to all the details of a service which lasted more than two hours. Bach's music must have been new to ninety-nine out of every hundred present, and it is not music readily "understanded of the people." Yet every note was heard with a patience which endured to the end. As each chorale began, the congregation rose and joined in the melody, after the good Lutheran fashion, while there were obvious signs of a deep impression made upon all present. Performances, as such, cannot, of course, be tolerated in our churches; but here was a great lesson taught in language more eloquent than that of any preacher, and received the more readily because its utterances appealed as only music can appeal, to human sympathies. After one experience of the special Lenten service, we are led sincerely to hope that the example set by the little church in Soho will be followed wherever the necessary means are obtainable.

MR. VAN PRAAG, one of the most able, industrious, trustworthy, and respected agents that for very many years has assumed a responsible position in the ordinary transaction of musical business in London, is about to start for California, where his family are residing. No familiar face will be more missed than his. For kindliness, courtesy and diligence combined, Mr. Van Praag, who has known, and been on friendly terms with all the great artists of the last thirty years and more, has rarely known an equal. Every one respected him for his sterling and excellent qualities; and every one, however regretting his loss, will heartily wish him "bon voyage," and happiness for the rest of his days in the far off country where he is about to rejoin his family, and which he will henceforth make his home.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

IN our last number we quoted from that singularly original and interesting book, "Another World," the method adopted in the "Star City," Montalluyah, of choosing partners at a ball by hand. We now quote a scarcely less inviting description of the manner of choosing them by foot:—

"There is another peculiar mode of choosing partners—'by foot'—but this is made to depend on the superior beauty of the foot, as decided by an arbiter, chosen by the company, and, of course, famous for his taste and knowledge of the beautiful. While the arbiter pursues his duties, the ladies are concealed behind a screen, which is, however, open sufficiently at the bottom to disclose the foot and ancle. She to whom the palm is awarded has the first choice of a partner, and the others follow in succession in the order in which they have been ranked. This diversion, though exciting great interest, is not so happy as 'the choice by hand.' The ladies whose feet are placed in a lower rank often think themselves aggrieved, and are slightly jealous of their rivals; for in spite of the efficacy of my laws, I could not—whilst giving just triumphs to superior beauty—altogether prevent a feeling of disappointment in ladies who saw the palm given to others by one recognised as an honest and able judge,—a man whose taste was known to be irreproachable. When the hand and foot of a young lady are inclined to coarseness, while at the same time her talents and goodness entitle her to a superior position, the fingers or toes, and afterwards the hand and foot themselves, are bound up for a certain number of hours each day. We do not like 'contradictions,' or, as I have before observed, we object to a garment partly of rich brocade, partly of common stuff."

We cannot agree with "Hermes" as to the inferiority of this last method of selecting a partner for the dance, with which, assuredly, the foot has more to do than the hand.

THÉODORE and Hippolyte Cogniard, now millionaires, in Paris, commenced as authors very modestly. On one occasion they had written a vaudeville, and awaited, for very good reasons, the authors' shares with great impatience. On the morning of the first performance, Hippolyte said to his brother: "You know we refer in our piece to a hatter. I have introduced the name of mine, X——; he will give me a new hat which I want very badly. You don't mind, do you?"—"Mind? No, not I," replied Théodore. But suddenly a thought struck him. He looked at his own hat, and paid a visit to his hatter. Having done so, he went back to the theatre, and whispered in the ear of the leading actor: "My dear fellow, you speak, you know, in your part, of a hatter. Just mention mine, Y— —; it will be a puff for him, and he will send me a new hat."—"All right." When the curtain rose, there were four persons in the pit, more especially interested in the piece; the Brothers Cogniard, and their hatters, MM. X—— and Y——, each of whom was anxiously listening for the puff. At last, the moment arrived. Attention!—Treason!—The villain of an actor pronounced the name of Z——, his own hatter.

THE practice of hissing a dramatic performance was first introduced at the Théâtre Français, on the 14th January, 1686. Previous to that period, if a piece was bad, the occupants of the pit, then the supreme judges in such matters, contented themselves with gaping. On the day in question, a five-act prose comedy, said to be written by Thomas Corneille, and entitled Le Baron de Fon Drières, was produced for the first time, and pronounced, not unjustly, a very dreary affair. Suddenly one of the spectators took it into his head to mark his disapprobation by a few sharp hisses. For the first few moments, the audience were astonished at this novel demonstration, but, having rapidly revolved the matter in their minds, no doubt, they seem to have thought it would be very charming to drown the voices of the actors under this new and disagreeable sibilant accompaniment, and hissing was inaugurated then and there.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—A novel feature in the history of the Society is about to be brought forward; the Committee having accepted the offer of Herr Ernst Pauer to deliver before the Society Three Lectures on the History of the Oratorio. These lectures, which will be largely illustrated by selections from various oratorios, from the earliest introduction of that form of composition to the time of Mendelssohn (including many pieces hitherto unperformed in this country), will take place at Exeter Hall, on Wednesday evenings, March 19th and 26th, and April 2nd.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.—The Third Subscription Concert of this society is announced to take place on Wednesday next, when Handel's Israel in Egypt will be performed, with Mr. Macfarren's additional accompaniments; the principal solo singers being Mdme. Elena Corani, Mdme. Patey, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Thurley Beale and Mr. Lewis Thomas. Dr. Stainer will preside at the organ, and the band and chorus, numbering 1200 performers, will be conducted by Mr. Barnby. The Choral Society, which has already attained a very high standard of excellence, will doubtless be heard to great advantage in the magnificent choruses.

THE HAGUE.—A short time since, during a performance of La Muette, the stage-manager came forward and informed the audience that the performance could not proceed, as the Masaniello, M. Trinquier, had refused to sing any more. Immediately upon this, Masaniello appeared in person, and declared that he by no means refused to go on with his part; he simply did not think he could appear before the public, as the manager had forbidden him to transpose the "Slumber Air." This gave rise to a discussion between the stage-manager, the singer, and the audience. Finally the latter sided with Masaniello, and the manager was compelled to permit the transposition. The performance then continued without further interruption.

Tims for Music.

News from the "Challenger," nothing ridiculous!
One Ocean's secret already disclosed,
The Gonotryx, O, the delightful pisciculus!
Lives a deal deeper than Science supposed.
Then hey for the Gonotryx, Gonotryx, Gonotryx!
Jolly young Gonotryx, swimming so free;
And soon may the "Challenger's" trawlings and bonny tricks
Drag more jolly news from the jolly old sea.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Madame Berger-Lascelles and Mr. Francesco Berger gave their first matinée for the season on Wednesday, to a full and fashionable assemblage of friends and pupils. The programme was varied and interesting, opening with the grand trio, in D, by Mendelssohn, well played by Miss Alice Lee (pianoforte), Herren Jacoby and Lidel (violin and violoncello). Beethoven's grand trio in B flat was also well given, Mrs. J. C. Langmore undertaking the pianoforte part. The trio was deservedly applauded. Miss Stella Hart, a pupil of Mr. Francesco Berger's, played Field's Nocturne in E flat, and Chopin's Valse in A flat, most effectively, as did also M. F. Berger Thalberg's Andante in D flat, and his own brilliant galop, "Suivez moi," both of which were most warmly received. Madame Berger-Lascelles displayed her charming contralto voice in "Di tanti palpiti," and in two new songs, "I weep alone" (F. Berger), and "Only the river knew" (S. A. Shepherd), both expressly composed for her, and, with Miss Bateman, a young lady who possesses a fresh soprano voice, the duetto from Rossini's Stabat Mater, "Quis est homo." Miss Bateman also sang F. Berger's song of "The Syren;" Mrs. Causton and chorus gave a solo and chorus, "Povera Rondinella;" and the Misses Stileman, Pinsuti's duet, "In ciel stellato." Mr. Ernest A. Tietkens sang the new song, "At Last," in his most perfect manner. Several choral pieces by Ricci, Campana, and S. A. Shephard, contributed to the success of the matinée. Mr. Francesco Berger, besides his solo performance, accompanied the vocal music on the pianoforte with his usual tact and judgment.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard Blagrove gave their second recital of concertina and pianoforte music, on Wednesday afternoon, at the Beethoven rooms, which was fully attended. The performance commenced with an arrangement of Mendelssohn's Air with Variations in D, for baritone concertina and pianoforte, well played by Mrs. and Mr. R. Blagrove, and much applauded. Mrs. R. Blagrove gave, to everybody's satisfaction, Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 29, Weber's Polonaise in E major (encored), and the pianoforte part of a new Concertante Duet from Faust, for concertina and pianoforte, and was rewarded with well-merited applause. Mr. Blagrove gave, with his usual excellence, Regondi's Les Oiseaux, and a concertina solo, selected from the works of Handel, in all of which he proved himself a most able artist. Miss Sophie Ferrari sang, in a most artistic and charming manner, Spohr's "Rose softly blooming," and a new song of her sister's (Francesca J. Ferrari), "Placida Zeffiretto," which delighted all present. Miss Helen D'Alton displayed her fine contralto voice to advantage in a sacred song by Dr. F. Hiller, and a new song (accompanied by the composer, Mr. Barri,) called "Mizpah;" both were favourably received by the audience. Mr. H. C. Sanders, a rising baritone, gave a German song by Fesca, and one by Pinsuti, and Mr. J. Zerbini accompanied with his usual ability.

A very attractive concert was given in Hanover Square Rooms, on Monday last, by Mrs. J. Holman-Andrews, who, with her clever daughters, Miss Gertrude and Miss Edith, took a prominent part. Mrs. Andrews, herself, did good service as accompanist, while the young ladies were heard to much advantage in various duets and songs. The duets included Sir J. Benedict's "Ties of friendship" (Crusaders) and Campana's "Vieni o bella." As to the songs, Miss Edith gave Blumenthal's "Love the Pilgrim," her sister's contribution being the very popular, "Si tu savais," in response to a unanimous encore of which Miss Gertrude sang "Robin Adair." Both ladies made a very favourable impression in all they did. The concert-giver was ably supported by Miss Edith Wynne, Madame Patey, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. J. G. Patey, whose names speak for themselves better than could any words of ours. Mrs. Holman-Andrews was assisted in the task of accompanying the vocal pieces by Messrs. Callcott, Blumenthal, and Pinsuti. We should add that Mr. and Mrs. R. Blagrove much increased the pleasure of the audience by their ably-played solos on the harmonium and pianoforte respectively.

Miss Clara Cox (R. A. M.), a pianist of considerable executive power, gave an evening concert at the Store Street Concert Hall, which attracted an overflowing audience. Miss Clara Cox played Ascher's "Alice," and the same composer's "La chant des Naiades," Wallace's "La Cracovienne," Thalberg's "Mosè in Egitto," and "Home, sweet home," and in all she was loudly applauded. She was assisted by Miss A. L. Okey, a young Australian pianist, whose performance received well-merited applause. Mdlle. Bonachi, a young Italian vocalist of merit gave "Robert toi" with genuine artistic feeling, and joined Signor Salvini in the grand duet from Lucrezia Borgia, and Luigi Ricci's waltz duo "La Danza." Miss Lily Edmonds sang a new song, "Sweet summer gales," and Miss Lucy Vennimore (a débutante), Mr. Ignace Gibsone's song, "Across the sea;" Miss Eva Edgar, a young vocalist of merit, also made a favourable début, and was called upon to repeat Ascher's "Clara." Messrs. Lansdown Cottell and Mr. C. F. Webb presided most efficiently at the pianoforte. The concert was a decided success.

PROVINCIAL.

Edinburgh.—From the Daily Review we learn that—

"Mr. C. Matthews concluded his successful engagement at the Theatre Royal with three of his best impersonations. On Monday and Wednesday evenings there were amateur performances by the officers and non-commissioned officers of the 93rd, supported by the ladies of the regular company, when the farce, Should this meet the eye, and the very popular drama, New Men and Old Acres, were presented. On Tuesday evening, Mr. P. Nevin, the respected treasurer of the theatre, to whose urbanity and energy visitors are largely indebted for the excellence of the arrangements in the auditorium, took a benefit, under masonic patronage, when the programme included The Wife's Secret, with an address by Mr. Nevin, and the farce, A Quiet Family. On Thursday evening, the 'nine nights' season' of opera began with Lucia di Lammermoor, in which Mdlle. di Murska again appeared in the title rôle, which was so great a success on the occasion of the performance of the opera last November."

Surbiton.—Mr. E. Burritt Lane, organist of Surbiton Park Church, gave his annual concert, on Tuesday evening, in Surbiton Park Hall. The vocalists were Miss Matilda Scott, Madame Poole, Mr. George Micklewood, and Mr. John Hodges; and the instrumentalists, Miss Wheeler and Mr. R. S. Hart (pianoforte), and Mr. Lazarus (clarionet). In the Surrey Comet, of March 8th, we find the following remarks:—

"In the instrumental department, Mr. Lazarus, who is a host in himself, delighted the audience with his charming performances on the clarionet. A Duo Concertante for clarionet and pianoforte, founded on airs from Bellini's Norma, was played by Messrs. Lazarus and Hart in a masterly manner; but it was reserved for Mr. Lazarus to achieve his greatest success in his own fantasia on favourite Scotch airs, which 'brought the house down;' and in response to the loud cries of 'encore,' he kindly came forward and played an Irish melody. Criticism on the magnificent playing of Mr. Lazarus is impossible, and to praise him is but to 'gild refined gold.' All we can do is simply to admire his genius, and its wonderful development.

"Mr. Russell never played, in our estimation, with more effect than on this occasion. The extreme delicacy with which he rendered Chopin's Berceuse was most charming to listen to, and of his fine playing in the concerted pieces we have already spoken. We ought to add, as a shadow to the picture, that we did not like his rendering of the fantaisie impromptu by Chopin, which struck us as wanting connection and as over-fast. His own polka is a very pretty and taking morceau de concert, and we cannot quite understand why it remains so long in MS. Certainly not for want of purchasers, should it be published, if the expressions of discontent heard in the room at 'not being able to get it' may be taken as a criterion. Why should we take time to speak of Madame Patey? One of the richest and most sympathetic voices ever artist had, under the control of a finished musician, cannot need any faint praise of ours to record its justly-earned fame throughout England. The dignity which Knight's old ballad, 'She wore a wreath of roses,' acquired in Madame Patey's hands was astonishing, and the admirers of the favourite old song loudly testified their great delight. This was sung as an encore to Sullivan's favourite, 'Golden days,' which must have proved golden indeed to its publishers. Mr. Pearson sang very sweetly and with good feeling the tenor music allotted to him, substituting 'Come into the garden, Maud,' for 'Good-bye, sweetheart.' We think we may safely say that we do not remember a concert in Croydon for many years which contained so many gems of the musical art, and such complete and finished execution. The audience was, as usual, large and attentive."

Chatham.—On Monday evening last a musical entertainment was given in the Lecture Hall, by Mr. Edward Dale, with the co-operation of Miss Minnie Curtis (soprano), and Mr. E. Curtis (pianist). The lady is a vocalist of superior attainments, her voice being of good register, perfectly even, and richly sympathetic. Miss Curtis promises brilliantly; and, should she fulfil our expectations, a star of unusual magnitude will be added to the small native constellation which now exists. Mr. Dale is eminently suited to the style of business which he undertakes; and, with Mr. Curtis at the piano, an entertainment is presented which must certainly secure the applause and cordial approbation of any audience. On the occasion in question it was eminently successful.

Madrid.—Madame Sass has made a great hit in L'Africaine, which was played four times in one week.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

After an absence of four months, Clement Martin's opera troupe has returned from Rennes, and we have had a week of capitally-selected and well-played operas. Lucie was the first produced, and went off well, as did Zampa, Violetta (alias La Traviata), La Fille du Regiment, Le Postillon de Longjumeau, and Docteur Crispin. Zampa, especially, went off well. It is an opera bubbling over with charming airs, among which I would mention "Il faut céder à ma loi" and "Douce jouvencelle," which were sung with very good taste and accuracy by the tenor, M. Bresson. Mdme. Depoitiers, who has taken the premier rôles in all of the above operas (with the exception of Le Postillon), is a pleasing and accurate singer; although her voice is not over strong, nor her compass very great, still the quality is good, and it is at once palpable that she has benefited by a careful education in her art. She not only sings well but acts well, especially in the last scene of the Traviata. M. Depoitiers, as the Sergeant, in La Fille du Regiment, was inimitable. M. Fronty, a very good barytone, has been singing in La Traviata, Lucie, and Docteur Crispin. The Postillon did not go off so well as the other operas. The tenor, M. Bouvard, who took the part of the Postilion (which part, by-the-bye, is a very trying one for any singer—being set so high), was completely worn out by the time the curtain fell after the last act.

Docteur Crispin, well known on the Italian Stage as Crispino e la Comare, is an opera bouffe by the Brothers Ricci; it is very "bouffe," but full of sparkling, light, pretty music just suited to the troupe now here. It has been played twice each time to a large audience. The chorus, consisting of 24, are quite up to the mark; but if there were 15 female voices instead of 12, I think it would be better; and if those 15 were well selected, it would be better still. The band of 24, under the conductorship of M. Champenois, has decidedly improved, but they are still inclined to overdo their accompaniment to certain soli, duos, &c.

Faust is announced for to-morrow. M. Clement Martin has begun his short spring season well, and I hope he will continue to do so. So long as he gives us operas within the capacity of his artists, all may yet be well.

There is to be a grand ball at the Etablissement on the 24th, in aid of the British Charitable Fund and British Free Schools. It will be a very good affair. S. C.

One of the "orders of the day" at the Conference of German Musicians, to be held at Leipsic, will be a proposition to unite a number of small towns into federations for the performance of great works.

Times for Music.

EBBING AND FLOWING.

Steadily guiding,
Peacefully gliding,
Onward the bark of the lovers is borne;
Fair summer weather,
Hearts knit together,
Fearing no slighting, and careless of scorn.
Merrily singing,
Troubles far flinging,
Pleasure and youth, love and happiness theirs;
Joys never ending
Sweetly are blending,
Strength'ning affection, and banishing cares.

Clouds gather over,
Too soon discover
Rapid transitions of time and of tide;
Dangers are nearing,
And careful steering
Is needful, if love in the boat may abide.
Cease, heart, thy beating,
Pleasures are fleeting,
Bright eyes must weep, and strong hearts must quiver;
Coming and going,
Ebbing and flowing,
Life is a myst'ry, deep as the river.

TUTOR FOR ENGLISH SINGERS.*

(From the "Times.")

An artist who, like Madame Sainton-Dolby, has attained eminence by the most legitimate means possesses a double claim to consideration when laying before the world the secret of her art, and pointing out the way by which others may follow in her steps. Such teaching has a special value, and, therefore, all lovers of music must welcome the volume in which one of the most accomplished English singers imparts the result of her experience. No work could be more gracefully offered to the public by one who for so many years has delighted them.

"'English by birth, English by education, English at heart,' says Madame Sainton, in the introduction to her book, 'I have often desired to offer to young pupils . . the fruits of my experience in a career to which I owe my happiest remembrances. In trying to smooth the difficulties in the path of such students I only pay a debt of gratitude to my compatriots who encouraged my first steps, . . . and to whom I owe the success of which I am and shall ever feel proud.'"

Madame Sainton's book, we sincerely believe, will be accepted in the spirit with which it is offered, and recollections of its author's career will encourage those who attentively follow up its counsels.

Madame Sainton confines the scope of her work to ladies' voices, and to those particular branches of the art which are essentially English; such, for example, as oratorio and ballad singing. On these topics she can discourse with an authority which no one would be bold enough to question.

Her manual is divided into three parts. The first part sets forth the elements of vocalization in a manner at once clear and succinct, and is enforced by examples in the shape of carefully graduated lessons with pianoforte accompaniment. The second section contains valuable hints on expression, style, and taste, and those higher qualities which distinguish the genuine artist from the ordinary singer. These matters are dwelt upon, however briefly, with real acumen, and the exercises which illustrate them are greatly to the purpose. These exercises, some written by Madame Sainton herself, others selected from Crescentini, Bordogni, and Panseron, all vocal teachers of renown, have a special value, inasmuch as, being thoroughly good music in the abstract, no less than useful for the purpose immediately in hand, they are calculated to stimulate the interest of the pupils, and incite them to extra diligence.

In the third part of her work, which to many will prove the most attractive, Madame Sainton gives suggestions as to the manner in which many of the best known airs from various authors should be vocally delivered. The selection is varied and excellent, and the suggestions are invaluable. If every vocal aspirant could not only understand them, but make practical use of them, we should have a great deal more legitimate singing than we can boast of now. We need add no more than that Madame Sainton's Tutor for English Singers is a real boon to those for whose instruction it is especially intended.

Vienna.—Gluck's Iphigenia was to have been revived at the Imperial Operahouse some time ago, but, for various reasons, including the indisposition of some of the principal artists, the public are still looking forward to the first performance, or, at least, were looking forward to it a day or two ago.—The season of Signor Merelli's Italian Operatic season, which commenced on the 10th inst., at the Theater an der Wien, is to extend to the 1st May. Among the principal artists are Mesdes. Adelina Patti, Barbara Marchisio, MM. Nicolini, Naudin, Graziani, and Vidal. Conductor, Signor Arditi.—Herr Feustl, banker, of Bayreuth, has just paid this city a visit. His object in coming was —not to put too fine a point on it—to "go round with the hat," for the Grand-National-Festival-Stage-Play-Theatre now in course of erection at Bayreuth.—It appears that the Universe has not exhibited the alacrity they ought to have exhibited in contributing to the funds for this great Wagnerian project. Some hundreds of thousands of thalers are still wanting, and 1874 is fast approaching.

Hanover.—Herr Hartzer, the sculptor, of Berlin, has been here and had an interview with the Marschner Memorial Committee. Having settled all the necessary preliminaries, he will set to work at once, and the statue will be ready for erection within four years at the utmost. The figure of the composer, and the two allegorical figures, will be of bronze; the pedestal, of the best sandstone.

Brussels.—Madame Adelina Patti will sing here in the month of April. Among the characters selected by her are Dinorah in Meyerbeer's opera, and Julia in M. Gounod's Romeo et Juliette.—Despite all the efforts of the Wagnerite party, Tannhäuser, lately produced at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, does not seem likely to become a stock piece. Now that public curiosity has been satisfied, Tannhäuser, like its predecessor, Lohengrin, here, will probably be quietly dropt.

REVIEWS.

Novello, Ewer & Co.

The Music to Shakespeare's "Tempest." By Arthur Sullivan.

There is not the slightest need for us to praise the Opus I. of Mr. Arthur Sullivan. His "Tempest music" long since took rank as a classical work, and it bids fair to retain an enviable amount of popularity—more perhaps than many subsequent works from the same pen. Accepting the music, therefore, as well known and well liked, our duty is simply to call attention to the issue of a new edition for voice and pianoforte duet, arranged from the full score by Mr. Franklin Taylor. Four hands can produce much effect with Mr. Sullivan's charming orchestral illustrations, even though their rich orchestral colour be wanting; and we can conceive no better home entertainment than the reading of Shakespeare's fairy drama while the music is so played. The volume is well got up in folio.

God's Time is the Best. Sacred Cantata. Composed by John Sebastian Bach. The English Translation and Adaptation by the Rev. John Troutbeck.

Clearly the tide is turning in favour of the sacred compositions of Sebastian Bach. Thanks to Mr. Joseph Barnby, whose persistent efforts have popularized the Matthew Passion, and bid fair to do the same for the kindred work according to St. John; amateurs are ready to know the old Leipsic Cantor as something more than a writer of fugues and instrumental pieces. One result of that readiness is now before us, and we confidently look for many others of a like kind. The publishers have an ample field in which to work. Bach left behind him the almost incredible number of 300 Church Cantatas, which were divided between his sons, Friedmann and Emanuel. Friedmann took the larger share (Emanuel having only eighty), and from his hands they soon passed to those of various purchasers. Thus the collection was scattered, but happily, in the early years of the present century, Herr Müller, a successor of Bach at the Thomas School, gathered together for that institution as many as 110. A number were published by Mendelssohn; and, in 1846, Mosewius, of Breslau, printed 146. That not a few are unsuitable for use in our day is tolerably certain; but, making allowance on account of these, there still remain enough to present, as we have already said, a noble field for publishing enterprise. Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. made a capital starting choice in the work before us—one of a number which give no indications of having been written, like the great majority, for a special occasion. Its German title is "Gottes Zeit ist die Allerbeste Zeit," and the work, laid out for solo voices, chorus, and small orchestra, begins with an orchestral introduction, Molto Adagio, in E flat, which is marked by a grave and tender beauty adapted to prepare the mind for what follows. A short choral Andante in the same key leads to an Allegro, "In Him we live," which in turn is replaced by a brief Adagio, "And in Him we die." All these movements might have been written by Handel at his best, such dignity and masterfulness do they display. The close of the Adagio on the dominant of C minor—"In him we die at His good time, when He wills"—could hardly be exceeded for impressive solemnity. Next follows a tenor solo, "O Lord, incline us to consider," in the key just named. Expressive as to the vocal themes, this number is remarkable for continued repetition of a particular theme by the orchestra, after the fashion of—to quote a familiar example—the ground bass in Handel's "Thou didst blow with Thy wind." The tenor solo leads directly to a Vivace (C major) for the bass chorus—a remarkable and noteworthy arrangement, which, so far as we know, has no precedent. Music so light and, in connection with such words as "Set in order thy house for thou shalt die," so trivial, may seem to demand adverse criticism; but Bach knew well what he was doing. The sentence here enunciated is the passionless, unfeeling voice of Fate; and when, at its close, a solemn choral Andante—"It is the old decree"—begins in F minor, we at once recognize the hand of a master of effect, as we do further on when the sopranos, hitherto silent throughout the movement, enter alone with a lovely passage on the words, "Yea, come Lord Jesus." After a repetition of this affecting device, varied as to details, the three lower parts again take up their theme; a climax being reached when the sopranos commence a final (solo) cadence, as the other voices cease with a forzando diminished seventh on E natural held against a tonic pedal (F). The "resolution" of this chord—dim. and pp—is something to linger over with delight. We next have an alto solo, "Into Thy hands my spirit I commend" (B flat minor) remarkable for the masterly working of its accompaniments; and, next, a bass solo, "Thou shalt be with me to-day," in the same key, changing to C minor. A striking feature of this movement is the appearance of a chorale for the alto chorus, which pursues its grave and stately way till the solo voice ceases, thence continuing for some time alone, and finally ending while the orchestra breathes out a most touching and beautiful accompaniment. A choral-line Andante, "All glory, praise, and majesty" (E flat), then leads to a fugue, with two subjects, on the words "Through Jesus Christ, Amen." Worked in somewhat elaborate fashion and in brilliant style, this movement fittingly ends a composition of such merit that we cannot for the life of us understand why it did not long ago become popular wherever lovers of noble music exist. But the more on this account are thanks due to the publishers for having now made it known, and we hope most sincerely that their enterprise as regards Bach's sacred works, will meet with a rich reward.

Boosey & Co.

My True Love has My Heart. Ballad. By Sir Philip Sydney. Music composed by J. Blumenthal.

The Elizabethan knight's charming verses are here worthily set. There is more than a touch of quaintness in the music, but it is quaintness of an original kind, and not merely an attempt to imitate the old English style. Mr. Blumenthal always writes in an interesting manner, and those who purchase the song before us will not be disappointed if they do so in expectation of something specially good.

Dinah Doe, The Golden-haired Darkey. Indian Pastorale. Words by F. C. Burnand. Music by J. L. Molloy.

A "nigger" song which, as a "nigger" song, may be very good. We do not profess to have the necessary qualifications for arriving at a trustworthy opinion. The names of the authors are, however, presumptive evidence in its favour.

Henry Klein.

One Unspoken Word. Song. Words by Charles Searle. Music by Harriet Young.

This is a superior song of its class; expressive, well written, and capable of making a good effect. We shall be disposed to give Miss Young's future productions a hearty welcome.

Kate Santley Valse. Par le Chevalier de Kontski.

A pretty waltz founded on the themes of songs sung by the lady after whom it is called.

Augener & Co.

The Queen of the Year. Song. Poetry by Eliza F. Morris. Music by C. H. Shepherd, Associate R. A. M.

We have here a song in praise of June—vice May, deposed for bad behaviour. Mrs. Morris's verses are pretty and thoughtful, as usual, and the composer has allied them to tuneful and effective, albeit very simple, music. The song deserves attention.

Hamburgh.—A four-act comic and romantic opera, Waldmeister's Brautfahrt, music by Herr Adolf Müller, has been produced at the Stadttheater, but achieved at most only a succès d'estime. Referring to this opera, a writer in a German contemporary observes: "There is a kind of music which has gradually fallen into discredit and disrepute; it is commonly known under the title of 'Conductor's music' ('Kapellmeistermusik'). For the benefit of any one to whom the term may be unintelligible, we beg to offer the following short explanation: A conductor, who conducts so and so many operas a week, becomes at last convinced that it is, after all, not so very difficult to manufacture something like what he has before him; nay, he believes, as he is practically a thorough musician, and knows all about the stage and the requirements of the public, that he cannot fail of success. He is, from long use, perfectly familiar with the tablature of opera, and is a famous adept at what Lessing denominates in literature 'the official style;' as to anything else necessary for the creation of so difficult a work—as for any indispensable quality which his good angel may have refused him, he troubles his head no further about it; he either does not deem it worthy of consideration, or, in his conceit, imagines it will come to him in his sleep. Thus it is that there spring into life those weakly bantlings, which usually never behold the light of the float anywhere but at the theatre where their authors occupy the post of conductor, and which, after a short existence, are doomed to be for ever buried beneath the dust of the library of the theatre. This is called 'conductor's music,' and, unfortunately, Waldmeister's Brautfahrt must be considered a specimen of it."

Stanza for Music.

Dear Father, we love you, but surely 'twas no bit
Of luck, that suggestion of likeness to Tobit;
By miracle, Tobit grew blind to the light;
You claim to possess a miraculous sight.
But one thing we hasten to grant, nothing loth,
The stories, dear Père, are Apocryphal—both.

Timber for Ships in Montalluyah.—Before timber is employed for ships, it is thoroughly seasoned by being exposed to the sun at particular hours of the day. Timbers that have passed through this process never shrink or warp. Wood cannot be used in shipbuilding until so prepared that no insects will touch it. In certain parts of the bottom of the great ravine is a liquid, the admixture of refuse of all kinds. After some years this liquid becomes of a golden colour for the depth of about two inches; beneath, it is of a muddy brown. The golden liquor so hardened wood that no insect could make any impression upon it, and no moisture penetrate the fibres. The liquid in a pure state is preserved in large vats ready for use. The timber having been thoroughly seasoned in the sun, each plank is cut and shaped to the exact form required, and is then soaked in this liquid. If the process of cutting were delayed till after the timber had been soaked, the parts where the cuttings had been made would be unprotected from the insects. If the soaking were delayed until after the ship had been put together, the four sides of each of the timbers where it is joined to other timbers, would in like manner be unprotected, and the insects eat their way between. The vessels built under my rule will exist unimpaired for many centuries, whilst those built under the former system were broken to pieces on account of their foulness and leakage, chiefly caused by the ravages of insects.—"Another World."

Among the artists engaged by Mr. Mapleson for the ensuing season at Her Majesty's Opera is a young tenor named Signor Amburro, who is said to have attained the highest position in the lyrical theatres in Italy. At the present time Mr. Mapleson is in Scotland with a portion of his Opera Company, and it was announced that Signor Amburro would make his first appearance on the British stage at the Theatre Royal, Glasgow, as Manrico in Il Trovatore. The anticipated début of the new artist,—described as that rara avis, a genuine Italian tenor—excited unusual interest, and the house was crowded to overflowing. But to the horror of the manager, Signor Amburro not only neglected to appear, but sent no letter or telegram explanatory of the cause of his absence. Fortunately Signor Mongini was at hand to undertake the part. Meantime the manager telegraphed to Messina, Milan, Turin, Paris and London. In vain, however, were all the hotels searched, detectives even being employed to discover the anxiously expected primo tenore; but at last the British Consul at Messina "wired" Mr. Mapleson, that Amburro was lying ill with a cold caught on his journey, at an Italian hotel in Milan, but that he would be in Glasgow in a day or two. On this, Mr. Mapleson ventured to announce his new "star's" début for the 12th inst,, as Fernando in La Favorita. Again there was a "rush" for places, but the public were only destined to meet with a fresh disappointment. The "golden voiced" tenor, it transpired, had left Milan en route for Glasgow, but since then nothing has been heard of him. All likely trains and diligences passing the Alps have been searched by the agents of the impresario, but so far these efforts have been fruitless. Meanwhile the arrival stations in Paris, Amiens, Folkestone, Dover and London are being watched, and, in Glasgow, a committee has been formed to run a special train to Edinburgh, where Signor Amburro is announced to appear on the 18th instant as Manrico, and on the 20th as Fernando, the latter rôle being his chef d'œuvre, and in the opinion of many competent critics, quite worthy of comparison with the performances of any predecessor.—(Communicated.)

M. Capoul has been singing in Rome.

Mr. Alfred Hemming has returned to town from Scotland.

Mr. Boucicault is reported to be writing a five-act comedy.

Verdi's La Forza del Destino has been produced with great success at Cairo.

A new opéra comique, entitled Mina, by M. Ambroise Thomas, is in the press.

Johann Strauss' new operetta, Le Carnaval de Rome, is said to have won a complete success at Vienna.

Signor Arditi has arrived at Vienna to conduct the Madame Adelina Patti's series of Italian operas.

Mdlle. Victoria Bunsen's concert is to take place on Wednesday evening next, by kind permission of Major W. Carpenter, at Ashley Place, Victoria Street.

The Andante and Scherzo of a symphony in F, by M. Charles M. Widor, were played at a recent Conservatoire Concert, and made a very favourable impression.

M. Schoelcher has presented to the library of the Paris Conservatoire a hundred volumes of music, comprising a magnificent collection of works by English composers.

M. Maurice Strakosch is said to have bought the exclusive right of performing Aida in the United States. Costumes to the value of 50,000 francs have been ordered from Milan.

A concert, for the benefit of the sufferers by the Northfleet calamity, was given on Monday last, at the Salle du Progres, Paris.

Signor Bevignani has returned to London, from St. Petersburgh, to fulfil his engagement as joint-conductor with Signor Vianen at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden.

Le Ménéstrel authoritatively contradicts a report that Mdme. Nilsson has just paid a visit to Berlin, but declined to appear at the opera, though offered a fabulous sum. The story was untrue on the face of it.

The Compass in Montalluyah.—The compass used in our ships is different to yours, being based on the fact that each country has a different attraction to certain liquids. In short, we apply an electrical power entirely unknown to you.—"Another World."

On Wednesday week the members of the Junior Garrick Club gave a dinner to Mr. John Oxenford, the well-known dramatist and dramatic critic of the Times, on which occasion he was presented with his portrait, as a recognition of his honourable and generous discharge of his critical duties.

Letters from Messina state that Mr. Arthur Byron, the English tenor, has had an immense success in the operas of Rigoletto and Elisir d'Amore, and has been the chief attraction at the Opera House this season. The two other tenors, Signors Morini and Mazzolini were "nowhere;" in fact, the public refused to hear them.

The Anchor in Montalluyah.—The anchor is made of iron-marble, the strongest composition we have, and used in the construction of the Mountain Supporter. In shape the anchor resembles a body with six legs like a fly—three on either side. Each leg has a crook at the end, which will grapple firmly wherever the least hold can be obtained.—"Another World."

A strange compliment is to be paid to Handel in Constantinople, or rather Pera. The success of the British Choral Union has stimulated the Armenians. The young ladies of the Agabian School are about to give a public performance of the Messiah, assisted by some gentlemen from the Choral Union. The principal choruses will be in English, but "See the conquering hero comes" will be in Armenian.

Professor Glover's cantata, St. Patrick at Tara, is to be given this evening in the Ancient Concert Rooms, Dublin, with full orchestra and chorus of 200. The principal artists are Miss Lina Glover, Miss Annie Brooks, Mrs. Scott Fennell, Messrs. Peele, Smith, Hemaley, and G. Kelly (vocalists), Miss Emilie Glover and Mrs. Mackey (harps), Herr Ellsner (violoncello), Mr. Levey leader of the band, and Professor Glover, conductor.

The late Mr. Balfe's manuscript opera "The Knight of the Leopard," taken (from Sir Walter Scott's Talisman), is to be given this season by Her Majesty's Opera Company, under the direction of Mr. Mapleson, at Drury Lane Theatre, with Mdlle. Christine Nilsson as the heroine (Edith Plantagenet). Sir Michael Costa, at the request of the composer's widow, is putting a finishing touch to the last act. The opera will be given about the end of June.

Mdlle. Victoria Bunsen has been making a "sensation" at Woolwich. At a recent concert held in the Artillery Theatre, which was chronicled in our impression last week, a local journal writes, that—"No less a luminary than the famous Swedish contralto, Mdlle. Victoria Bunsen, from Her Majesty's Opera, appeared. Her beautiful, nay, wonderful, voice, rolled out in rich cadences the recitative and aria, "Nacqui all' affano," with marvellous effect, and she had to reappear, bow, and retreat, under a shower of bravas."

Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's Entertainment.—We hear that a new Entertainment, written by Mr. F. C. Burnand, with music by Mr. J. L. Molloy, is in preparation at the Royal Gallery of Illustration, and will be produced at an early date, we presume, in the place of Happy Arcadia, which has now reached its 140th representation. Although this clever satire on Arcadian existence seems from the state of the Gallery still to hold its influence over full audiences—novelty, here as elsewhere, asserts its claims, and cannot be overlooked by the management. The long run of My Aunt's Secret, with its clever situations and charming melodies, warrants the prophecy of success for the new piece, which has fortunately been entrusted to the same author and composer.

The members of the Noblemen and Gentlemen's Catch Club have appointed Mr. Land, conductor of the London Glee and Madrigal Union, to the office of secretary, vacant by the death of Mr. Bradbury. The Noblemen and Gentlemen's Catch Club was instituted by a number of noblemen and gentlemen for the encouragement and fostering of native talent in the composition and performance of glees, catches, canons, &c.; a species of music peculiar to this country, and for which it is considered to be unrivalled. For a long series of years the meetings of the club were held at the Old Thatched House Tavern, St. James's Street; they now take place at Willis's Rooms.

During a recent concert at Munich, a double-bass was stolen. The Police asserted that it had been stolen by a pickpocket. Who, on earth, however, goes to a concert with a double-bass in his pocket? He must have a very large pocket!

Our correspondent at St. Petersburgh thus describes the scene at the Italian Opera in that city on the night when Madame Patti took her benefit. The Emperor, with other members of the Imperial family, was present, and a most brilliant audience crowded the house. The bénéficiaire appeared in the first act of Il Barbiere, the second act of Rigoletto, and the second of Dinorah. When the curtain first rose, Madame Patti came forward to be presented with a choice basket of flowers, and her reception was so enthusiastic that it was some time before the opera could proceed. After each act the most exquisite bouquets were showered down, and at the conclusion of Il Barbiere, his Majesty paid the fair artist the flattering compliment of going on the stage and personally congratulating her in the warmest terms on the admirable performance she had just given. This gracious act of the Emperor was loudly cheered, and by the audience was responded to with a fresh shower of wreaths and flowers. Among the many valuable gifts offered to Madame Patti, was a magnificent diamond couronne, representing seven wild roses, which was presented to her while the audience stood. She seemed greatly overcome with emotion at these repeated tributes to her talents. At the termination of the performance the admirers of the fair cantatrice renewed their plaudits. Not only the passage from the Operahouse, but even the corridors and staircase of the hotel were lined by the friends of Madame Patti, and the whole distance was strewn with flowers. The value of the couronne is said to be £1,400. Madame Patti has now left this scene of her triumphs to win more laurels in the gay capital of Austria.—Daily Telegraph.

GOTHA.—At the special invitation of the Duke, Herr Theodor Wachtel has just fulfilled a short engagement. Of course, he appeared as the jack-booted hero of Le Postillon de Longjumeau. Raoul in Les Huguenots was another part selected by him. Before his departure, he received from the Duke the cross of the Saxe-Ernest-House-Order.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine, (Longman & Co.,) they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from, Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

PREFACE.

No country possesses more good voices than England, and many voices would be a fortune to their owners if they knew how to use them.

Vocal Exercises, however, are much neglected, owing, in a great measure, to their monotony of passage and of style.

The object of these Studies is to make practice as attractive as possible, and the Waltz form has therefore been chosen for its liveliness.

A selection has been made of passages best suited to give flexibility to the voice, and the six Waltzes here presented contain the germs of a thorough method of vocal practice.

The Italian language is preferred on account of the openness of the vowels; but these studies can be used advantageously without words, by simply "vocalising" on the vowel A (pronounced in Italian, Ah.)

Commas (,) are placed where breath is to be taken. At first, however, pupils should practise each study very slowly, and draw breath whenever found necessary.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country. The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. VAN PRAAG.

MR. VAN PRAAG, who has been for many years past well known to the members of the Musical Profession, and the public, as holding a responsible position at the principal Concert-rooms of the West End, is now, in his 74th year. In addition to his failing health and strength, he has also recently become a widower, and is, by this sad bereavement, left alone, with not a relative in England to aid or take care of him. He has children in California who wish him to go out to them, and it is his own desire, notwithstanding his age and infirmities, to do so. Want of means for undertaking so long and expensive a journey, which his children are unable to supply, however, preclude the possibility of his leaving England. Under these circumstances, a few friends, well able to bear witness to his respectability, honesty, and courtesy in the discharge of the duties he has so "well and worthily fulfilled," are anxious to raise a Subscription in his behalf, to which contributions are earnestly and respectfully requested.

WORDS BY (SONG.) MUSIC BY

WM. HENDERSON. EMILE BERGER.

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May! What joys at-tend thine ad-vent gay!

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May!
What joys attend thine advent gay!
On every tree the birdies sing,
From hill and dale glad echoes ring;
The lark, inspir'd, to Heav'n ascends,
The gurgling brook in beauty wends
By mossy bank and grassy brae,
Where violets bloom and lambkins play.
Delightful Spring—sweet month of May
What joys attend thine advent gay!

"ANOTHER WORLD."

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

Another World; or, Fragments from the Star City of Montalluyah (Samuel Tinsley), by "Hermes," is a work full of quaint fancy and powerful imagination, at once ably and gracefully written. The writer professes to give an account of some of the ways peculiar to the inhabitants of one among the many star worlds in the populousness, and possibly higher civilization and morality, of which eminent men have declared their belief. Montalluyah is conjectured, in the editor's introductory remarks, to represent the planet Mars,* though certainly the beatific state of tranquillity and well-being that distinguishes the population are far from being consistent with that warlike name. The Tootmanyoso, or supreme Monarch of the Star City, who unfolds its wonders, has been a great reformer, and has laboured during centuries—life being far more prolonged there than on the earth—to bring his reforms to perfection. Among these are the elevation of women, the establishment of perfect purity and happiness in the married state, the development of national food resources, the abolition of madness, the utilisation of the power of the sun, the use of electricity for all purposes, from raising a huge mountain-supporting tower a mile high to ministering to public amusement by lifting performers in the air, and many other points. Of course, there is much of the marvellous, and even the incredible, about the book; but, as a rule, the gravity with which the story is told secures attention for even the most fantastical or improbable statements. It is impossible to read without an amused pleasure the Tootmanyoso's description of the social customs of his imaginary State, especially as regards the relations between the sexes and the rearing of the young; and much delicate satire, without any semblance of effort or immediate application, is aimed against flaws in our mundane systems. In every sense, the book is out of the common beat, and will well repay perusal by all thoughtful readers.

(From the "Shipping Gazette.")

Under this title, a writer, who veils himself under the name of "Hermes," describes an ideal country, supposed to exist in one of the planetary bodies belonging to our system, and, favoured by this convenient fiction, details a beau-ideal of domestic and political life, which we, in this inferior world, might well envy. Allegories of this sort have not been unknown before, but such a wide and comprehensive system of public and private conduct founded upon odd theories, and wrought out with such patient minuteness, has never, that we remember, been conceived. The book is altogether exceedingly curious. Montalluyah is the designation of the supposed city where the reforms of the supreme ruler, named Tootmanyoso, have achieved such wonderful and beneficial results. Nothing seems to have escaped the vigilant and all-searching prevision of this inspired personage; and the laws he has originated for the management of the city in question embrace every possible field of human operation, whether incident to the household or the senate, to the acts of every-day life, or to the multifarious applications of scientific knowledge. The genius of Tootmanyoso, in a word, appears to have been as boundless as his powers of administration were irresistible; and when he passed away, which we are led to infer he did, he left the fortunate city in which he flourished in a state of perfect happiness, purged of everything like sin, and governed by laws so sagacious, appropriate, and efficient, as to realise a Utopia to which all would desire to belong. The manner in which "Hermes" has conducted his narrative exhibits singular variety and consistency as a piece of invention. He tells the story of Montalluyah with all the coolness and gravity of a veritable historian, and describes a code of municipal and social laws, fantastic though they be in character, and professedly fragmentary, which wear an amusing colour of truth and reality. The precise purport of the book is not exactly intelligible, but it may be accepted as a pleasant satire upon the vices and conventionalities of a more mundane sphere, and the development of a general system of ethical polity which would conduce to virtue and happiness were the original Adam less evil and insensate than it is. So ingenious a people as those who reside in the Star City could have but peculiar views as regards ships and navigation, and "Hermes" devotes a chapter or two to explain the sort of craft that traverses the seas of Montalluyah. The shape of the fish is abandoned for that of the swan, on the principle that the fish which is "formed to live and to act under water, was hardly a fit model for ships intended to float on the surface." Upon this idea the vessels of Montalluyah are built; and as everything is done in that happy place under the influence of consummate wisdom, the swan ships, though destitute of masts and the ordinary gear that we employ in our own benighted world, and propelled wholly by electric means, enjoy a charmed life; and by the peculiar seasoning given to the timbers, the imperviousness of the material, and its requisite buoyancy, neither sink nor break, but in the most terrific hurricanes, "come up smiling," without strain or injury. In these fortunate regions, therefore, it may be presumed that Underwriters and Insurance Offices are unknown. It may be incidentally remarked, in reference to these ships, that the idea does not altogether belong to "Another World." We also have our Tootmanyoso in the person of Mr. George Peacock, of Starcross, whose Swan yachts have been familiar objects for many years past to all railway travellers on the coast of Devon.

* We are strongly inclined to the belief that Venus is the planet, about the inhabitants, laws, and manners of which "Hermes" tells us so many interesting things.—Ed. M. W.

"A CLERK THERE WAS OF OXENFORDE."

Chaucer.

(From Punch.)

Mr. Punch is gratified at reading in the Era that a banquet has been given to Mr. John Oxenford, and that his portrait has also been presented to him. The majority of those who rendered these tributes are connected with the drama. Literature, however, also owes a debt to a scholar of varied accomplishment, a humourist of the best type, and, let Mr. Punch add, in these days of "graphic slip-slop," a writer of pure and admirable English. Mr. P. fills his own glass to Mr. O., and, ere emptying it, winks, which otherwise unjustifiable demonstration implies a demand when Mr. Oxenford intends to publish anything more of a Rabelaisian character.* 'Tis "looked for at his hand." This said, Mr. Punch, who is everything as well as critical, but can also be that, would note that the gentleman who proposed Mr. Oxenford's health insisted on a fact in which that critic's very highest excellence does not seem to lie. "It was a proud thing for him to remember that he had never drawn a tear from one man, woman, or child, whom he had had, in the course of a long career, to pass judgment upon in his official capacity." It is a natural thing that to a theatrical gentleman this should seem a very proud thing. Well, as regards "woman or child," let that pass. No one would willingly make either cry, except for joy. But as regards "man"—well. Firstly, a man who blubs over anything that can be written against him is a booby, whom it were gross flattery to call an ass, so we have no compassion for him. But secondly, who or what is an actor that he is not to be treated as honestly and severely as a painter, sculptor, author, composer, or any other artist? Why is he not to be flagellated, if he deserves it?—Echo answers that she has not the slightest idea. But as regards Mr. Oxenford's criticisms, the truth is, that he is a master of the English language, and his criticisms on stupidity, or vulgarity, or negligence, are so deftly conveyed, that while they are perfectly lucid to those who read between the lines, a silly, vulgar, or negligent person fails to comprehend that he is being scarified. The educated public is informed, and our "blubbing" friend is still happy. Mr. Oxenford is too well aware of his critical responsibilities to evade his duty, and those who "are not simple men" admire alike his perspicacity and his subtlety of literary art. There, that's Mr. Punch's speech for the Oxenford banquet, and now he pledges his friend, J. O., in a cup like unto that of one Friar John of the Funnels.

* Never, let Mr. Punch well understand, except in the columns of the Musical World.—Diehlky Peters.

PUBLIC CHARACTERS ON THE STAGE.

(To the Editor of the "Daily Telegraph.")

Sir,—As a sufferer myself from imitators throughout the country, I fully sympathize with Mr. Buckstone's sorrowful complaint that I mimic him. I also lament that I should, in a moment of heedless hilarity, have given the public an impression that Mr. Buckstone had ever appeared in the character of Hamlet. In future I shall be more true to facts, and only imitate him in the character of Iago, which I saw him perform some time since at the Queen's Theatre, and which deeply impressed and affected me. In deference to the Lord Chamberlain, I shall, however, refrain from assuming his "make-up."

After Mr. Buckstone's protest, I anticipate an objection from Mr. Sims Reeves to my singing in Don Giovanni, where, I confess, the grounds of complaint are most justifiable, my imitation of that great artist's style and purity of tone being, I am told, "most extraordinary." As the only complete amende, I give Mr. Buckstone free permission to imitate yours truly, J. L. Toole.

P.S.—But "not before the Boy."

[We insert Mr. Toole's reply; but we must at the same time state, on Mr. Buckstone's authority, and at his request, that the letter in our impression of yesterday was a forgery.]

WAGNER'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

One magnificent morning last summer, a company of four gentlemen and one lady were partaking of a simple breakfast in a room of the Russischer Hof, or Russian Hotel, Weimar. The life and soul of the party was a thin man with sharply marked features, and long grey hair hanging down his back. It was the Abbate Franz Liszt, aged 61. To his right sat a short, sturdy man, with "an imperial head that looked as though cast in bronze;" this was Richard Wagner. At his right, sat Bülow's former wife, Cosima, Liszt's natural daughter, and then said to be united to Richard Wagner by a civil marriage. She was a tall and commanding woman; her face was, however, anything but beautiful; still, her features were animated and interesting, and her eyes especially expressive. The two other gentlemen were a pupil of Liszt's and a Wagner enthusiast, very well-known, and very often mentioned, in the South of Germany. We will here introduce him under the pseudonym of Dr. S. After Wagner espoused Bülow's divorced wife, the intercourse between him and Liszt had been broken off. The outwardly pedantic Roman Catholic Abbate could not become reconciled to what had taken place. The artistic contact, the musical relationship, which bound Liszt to Wagner, had not, however, been at all shaken. With this, however—that is to say, the artistic contact—Herr Wagner was perfectly satisfied, and made no effort to renew their personal intercourse. Certain facts reported to have happened in Wagner's immediate circle made it appear by no means improbable that Wagner, as a man, did not speak especially well of Liszt as an artist; that Liszt's success excited the envy of the king of absolute music. The case was different with Cosima. Inspired by rapturous admiration and a child-like affection towards her father, she succeeded in so exerting the very great influence she possessed over Wagner, that the coldness between the two men became less, and a time was fixed for a meeting to discuss family matters at Weimar. The meeting took place. The result was a thorough reconciliation, due, in no small degree, to the marked and affectionate courteousness which Wagner displayed towards his father-in-law. The sole stipulation Liszt made was that his daughter Cosima should embrace Protestantism, and have her civil marriage with Wagner consecrated by the rites of the Protestant Church. The lady's conversion and the Protestant ceremony were performed very quietly and secretly last autumn at Bayreuth. As the company we have introduced to the reader sat at breakfast in the Russischer Hof, Weimar, the various points of difference were settled to the satisfaction of all concerned; and the conversation then turned upon the musical subjects of the day, particularly in relation to Wagner's music. Wagner soon got upon his favourite hobby, and began attacking journalists; several of these unfortunate gentlemen fared very badly at his hands. Liszt took the opposite side. "I will not cede a single jot to journalists," replied Wagner. "I will not have them write at all about me; they understand nothing of the subject. I have fully made up my mind that at the Festival Performances I will not admit into my theatre a single journalist—that is, of the opposition clique; no, not if he had a hundred patron's tickets in his hand. I will return him his three hundred thalers, for into the theatre he shall never penetrate." "Well, I am not so violent against journalists," replied Liszt. "I have even begged one journalist to take care of my reputation when I am dead; for I am particularly desirous that an authentic chronicle of my life and of my artistic career shall then be given to the public. My official chronicler is A. W. Gottschalg, the well-known organist here in Weimar. He receives all the notices written concerning me, all my musical compositions, &c. In addition to this, a sum of 40,000 florins will be paid him out of my estate at my decease. This will he employ in travelling all over the Continent, all over England, and America, for the purpose of collecting all the notices and literary musical articles written about me. In this way I am sure of being handed down to Posterity in my true colours as I really am." "I have adopted a different plan," replied Wagner. "I am myself my own official biographer, for no man but me understands the matter. I have written an Autobiography comprising everthing that relates to me. In this Autobiography shall Posterity study, and from it learn to understand, Wagner." "Where do you keep the book?" inquired Liszt. "I had 14 copies of it struck off some time since, and keep them in my house at Bayreuth. I have been endeavouring to hit upon a plan by which I may thoroughly secure them from all danger of thieves and fire. At first I thought of confiding them to my worthy friend, Freustel, but, he already has the MS. of *Rheingold in his fireproof Castle, and I do not want to have two many in one place. The plan of depositing the work at some large banking establishment is attended with dangers of its own; so I shall probably decide on entrusting it to one of the higher Courts of Justice."

Some months elapsed, winter had begun, and Herr R. Wagner had commenced, with his wife, a tour through the North of Germany. He has himself begun publishing in the Musikalisches Wochenblatt, Nos. 1—3, his experience of the trip. What he has said about conductors, stage-managers, and managers, will have already filled with dread the heart of many a manager in the South of Germany, whose management Herr Wagner will touch upon during his trip in the spring, (for in the spring, Wagner will visit all the German operahouses between the Maine and the Mediterranean). During his Northern tour, he went, among other places, to Cologne, not to indulge in a friendly chat with his friend Hiller, but to ridicule the getting-up of Die Zauberflöte, and, as a relaxation, to hold a grand levee of his faithful adherents in that city. As we all know, he made a long speech on the occasion about himself and what he had done. During his speech, his glances darted searchingly around the room, and there was not an individual present whose looks were not carefully scanned. There was no wolf in the flock. Suddenly, his flow of words stopped, and his eyebrows were contracted with a threatening aspect. Leaning against a pillar was a journalist, in flesh and blood, with his pencil and shorthand note-book in his hand. How had he got there? The greatest care had been taken not to admit any of the opposition people into the favoured circle. Wagner was about to break off in his speech, and summon the offender to give an account of what he was doing, when, casting a still sharper glance than before to the spot, he perceived the individual was no other than Doctor S.; and, half satisfied, he continued his speech. When he had concluded, he proceeded, amid the uninterrupted applause and the homage of all present, to take a turn round the room, and exchange a few sarcastic or friendly observations with one and the other. He thus came to Dr. S., who was still leaning against his pillar, and reading over what he had written. "You also belong to the criticising journalists, I suppose, as I saw you writing away so industriously"—Wagner remarked, addressing the Doctor. "How can you imagine, master," stammered the Doctor, taken aback, "that I could be capable of such a thing. I put down every word that flows from your lips, and what I thus preserve is the manna of my mind. Have you settled about the fourteen copies of the Biography yet; eh, master?"—added Dr. S. "No!"—replied Wagner, without giving the speaker any hope that a copy would ever be entrusted to his custody. The next day the Doctor returned home. He did not forget, however, Wagner's Autobiography. He wrote, therefore, to a friend he had made at the Bayreuth Whitsuntide Concert, begging he would be good enough to telegraph as soon as Wagner returned to that town. With feverish anxiety he awaited, day after day, the arrival of the message. At length, one fine Sunday afternoon in December, the messenger from the telegraph office made his appearance, and was rewarded with a shining florin, while, that same evening, Dr. S. was seated in the first train for Hof, near Bayreuth. The Doctor, who had brought an iron chest with him, proceeded at once to Wagner's. "Master," said he, as, with low bows, he entered Wagner's study, "I am here, because I cannot give up a faint hope that you will deem me worthy of keeping for you one copy of your Autobiography I have brought with me a fire-proof safe, that defies burglars, in which at once to lock up the book and keep it until you ask for it back, Master." Wagner drew from his pocket his red silk pocket-handkerchief, and held it a moment to his face. He then went silently into the next room, whence he soon afterwards returned as silently, carrying something shaped like a book, and

* The original score of the Walküre is in the possession of the King of Bavaria, who guards it with such jealous care, that, a short time since, he would not lend it to Wagner himself to prepare the score for the Festival performance.—H. K.

wrapt up in canvas. A spirit of sacred earnestness overspread his face, and every one of his movements was grave and measured. The handsome governess followed him with sealing-wax and a gigantic seal. A solemn stillness reigned throughout the room, as Wagner, full of dignity, impressed seal after seal upon the canvas. Under each seal he placed a piece of white tape half an ell long, and on the end hanging down he also impressed a large seal. After having affixed seven such seals, he handed the parcel to Dr. S. "Here," he said, in a solemn and elevated tone, "I confide to you the book with seven seals. Keep it as a sacred deposit, more carefully than your life itself. At the last day, I shall call upon you to account for it." Hereupon the parcel was deposited with great ceremony in the iron-safe. Dr. S. then made his way direct to the station. He travelled all night, arriving at Leipsic next morning when the sun was well above the horizon. He proceeded at once to a publishing firm. "Have you hooked the fish?"—asked the publisher, with a most eager air. Dr. S. replied, "Yes, I have. I think we will not publish it under seven thalers a copy." The parcel was quickly opened, and inside was Struwelpeter, a torn, dirtied, dog's-eared picture book, belonging to Siegfried, Wagner's little son.—H. K.—(Quoted in the Berlin Echo.)

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The short season of Italian opera given here by Mr. Mapleson's troupe has been again a great success. The series consisted of ten representations:—Lucrezia, Lucia, Freischütz, Les Huguenots, Trovatore, Don Giovanni, Rigoletto, Zauberflöte, Marta, and Fidelio. The artists who appeared, and are well known in London, were Mdlle. Tietjens, Mdme. Sinico, Mdme. Trebelli-Bettini, and Mdlle. Ilma di Murska; Signori Mongini, Bettini, Agnesi, Mendioroz, Borella, and Foli. Then we had the débuts of Mdlle. Ostava Torriani (soprano), Mdlle. Justine Macvitz (contralto), Signor Cantoni (tenor), Signor Del Puente (baritone), and Signor Pro (bass). Of the well known artists and their familiar performances I need not say more than that they were fully enjoyed and appreciated by large audiences. Of the new appearances I may briefly give an individual opinion. Mdlle. Torriani made an undoubted and well deserved success as Lucia. She possesses a good soprano voice, nearly always in tune, powerful in the upper register, but somewhat weak in the middle and lower. Her Leonora in Trovatore was not so good; she regained her former position, however, as Gilda in Rigoletto. Mdlle. Macvitz's contralto voice is of fine quality, round and true. In her first appearance (as Maddalena), she suffered from stage fright, which materially interfered with her singing and acting. The tenor, Signor Cantoni, is at least respectable, and does everything he has to do with commendable care and confidence. Perhaps the most promising début of all was that of Signor Del Puente. His first performance (Il Conte, in Trovatore,) was not remarkable, but in the much more exacting part of Rigoletto he made a sterling sensation. He is young, and has a capital stage appearance, his voice is good, and in his vocalization he displays no offensive faults. His youthful enthusiasm certainly at times betrays him into a certain amount of exaggeration, which will doubtless be toned down as he gains in experience. His conception and acting of the part were alike admirable, and I expect that he will make his mark in London. I cannot speak in favourable terms of Signor Pro, neither in regard to his singing nor acting. I should add that on no former visit have the chorus and orchestra been so efficient. This told proverbially for good on the performances.

Signor Aramburo, the new tenor, as your readers would see from a "communicated" notice in your last number, did not turn up at all. The dissatisfaction was great, especially as no explanation or apology was made by Mr. Mapleson. Glasgow folks have thorough business notions; and when they enter into a contract with anyone for a specified article they are apt to resent any deviation from the original bargain, be that bargain made with an impresario of Italian Opera or any other public caterer of amusement. A performance, this week, of Handel's Israel in Egypt brings our present musical season to a close.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

During last week we have had the repetition of Docteur Crispin, and the production of Faust and Hamlet. Faust pleased the least of all the operas yet produced. The Mephistopheles of M. Depoitiers was not what it ought to be, nor was the Siebel of Mdlle. Faigle. M. Fronty's singing as Valentin, however, made up in some measure for the above defects. A sort of "Don Giovanni" supper scene, entitled "Nuit du Walpurgis," in Act 4—the beautiful waltz indifferently sung, without any ballet and no church scene—did not elicit much applause from a not over-crowded house.

Very different in every way was the reception on Saturday, and repetition, last evening, of Hamlet. From first to last this opera was listened to by a very large, attentive audience, among whom were many critical "amateurs de musique." M. Fronty took the rôle of the hero. It is always a treat to hear his careful method of singing, and his splendid baritone voice, but a little attention to light and shade might render it more agreeable. Ophélie was acted and sung by Madame Depoitiers with her usual care and good taste. M. Depoitiers took the part of the King, M. Bresson that of Laertes, M. Kinnel, L'Ombre, while la Reine Gertrude was impersonated by Mdlle. Noaille, a new acquisition to our troupe at Boulogne, whose excellent voice and capital rendering of the part, made her at once welcome and welcomed. An incidental divertissement was danced in the 4th Act by Mdlle. Osmond and Ayelle (also new comers). The band was, of course, on each representation of Hamlet, put on its metal; however, it stood the test well, and, last night, the orchestral parts of this elaborate work were capitally rendered.

The ball for British Charities, advertised for next Monday, does not seem to take, owing to some uncharitable persons crying it down because it occurs in Lent. They "marry and are given in marriage" in Lent—the theatre is crammed in Lent—"Que voulez vous?"—or rather, "Qu'est-ce-qu'elles veulent?" Answer, Three francs a-head to pay for a ticket. S. C.

CHARLES KNIGHT.

BORN 1791. DIED 1873.

White head, keen eye, kind smile, that we no more
Shall greet in its earned eve of lettered lore;
One of the truest aids of Captain Pen,
Who bore his flag of "Peace, good-will to men,"
Foremost and furthest of his sacred band,
Leagued to spread light of letters through the land.
And sure a hope forlorn they might be deemed,
Who of assault on that strong fortress dreamed,
Where, guarded close by Prejudice and Pride,
Contented Ignorance such foes defied.

Long was the leaguer, toilsome, large of cost,
And oft the cause to fainter hearts seemed lost,
But he was of those sanguine, cheery souls
Who through the races' dust still see the goals;
Still his strong frame was toughest-braced for toil,
His hand still darkest with the seemly soil
Of the black press, from whose ink-streams a light
Was yet to radiate through England's night.
Ofttimes the fuel well-nigh failed his flame,
And Ruin stood between him and his aim,
But manfully he grappled the grim foe,
Nor ever yielded sword, though oft struck low.
And his reward was that he lived to see
Cheap Letters broad-cast sown, and Knowledge free!

* * * * * * * *

Stout, life-long fighter, as he was, for light,
His soul, if keen, was ever kind and bright,
Cordial and constant—so that truth may say
No truer, manlier man e'er passed away,
None that to all of his best gladlier gave,
None worthier of a good word o'er his grave.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The concert on Saturday afternoon was one of unusual interest. Beethoven's noble overture to the drama of Collin, which bears the name of Coriolan, opened the programme with as fine a performance as could be desired; while the graceful, piquant, and spirited prelude to Auber's charming opera, Les Diamans de la Couronne, was the last piece in the selection. Beethoven's overture was, doubtless, inspired rather by the Coriolanus of Shakspere, than by the German play of which Shakspere's was, of course, the prototype; and as a "character-piece," to use a not unfit expression adopted by many critics, is only equalled, if indeed equalled, by the superb overture to the Egmont of Goethe. Both Coriolan and the Diamans de la Couronne were admirably played by the orchestra which Mr. Manns directs so well. That each should have created a marked sensation was only a fresh evidence of the power of music to give vivid expression to widely different ideas. No two compositions could be more unlike, and yet both answer their purpose. Of course, we do not think of comparing so light and airy a trifle as Auber's overture with the profound and glowing inspiration of Beethoven; but each, after its manner, says all that was meant to be said, and says it in perfection. Another very interesting "number" in the programme was the "Parisian Symphony" of Mozart—so called because it was written by "the greatest of abstract musicians" (as Herr Wagner somewhere styles him), for the "Concerts Spirituels," during his third visit to Paris (1778), when he was little more than 23. This lively and spontaneous effusion is familiar enough to musicians and amateurs; but on the present occasion a slow movement was introduced which has rarely, if ever, been heard in public since the first production of the symphony, not far from a century ago. It is known that Mozart wrote two slow movements, the one which is ordinarily associated with the "Parisian Symphony," and which, indeed, is incorporated in all the editions of the accredited score, not having satisfied the director of the "Concerts Spirituels." It was a happy idea of Mr. Manns to give the second andante a hearing, notwithstanding that it was subsequently rejected by Mozart, who, even after making three versions, was unable, as the sequel proved, to satisfy himself; and "G.," the thoroughly informed annotator of the Crystal Palace programmes, gives an interesting account of the whole transaction. The movement which, under the circumstances, Mozart had no alternative but to substitute temporarily for the other, is brief, and may fairly be likened to "a song without words." Nothing more tuneful, nothing more delicately harmonized and instrumented for the orchestra can be imagined. But the entire symphony, played with congenial spirit, pleased the audience on Saturday, and its masterly finale, in which Mozart's command of contrapuntal devices is so amply exhibited, produced a strong impression.

After all, however, the conspicuous feature of the concert was Herr Joachim's performance of his own "Hungarian Concerto" for violin, with orchestral accompaniments. Often as this very remarkable work has been played by its composer, it was, perhaps, never so thoroughly appreciated as on the occasion under notice. The third of Herr Joachim's concertos, it far surpasses its precursors, in F sharp minor and G major—full of excellence and of promise as those two were. We need not again enter into a description of its plan, or dwell upon the artistic mastery of its development; but we may add that it improves on every hearing, and that as a characteristic piece, varied and coloured throughout by the accents and rhythms of a peculiar national musical phraseology (the Hungarian), the Concerto in D minor stands alone. Further than this, regarded merely as a composition per se, it approaches nearer to the great violin concertos of Beethoven and Mendelssohn than anything else of the kind which modern art has produced. The orchestration is masterly. Every note given to every instrument seems to be exactly in the right place; and elaborate as is the general conduct of the orchestral accompaniments, they always blend with, or support, as occasion may require, the part for the "solo" instrument. The only drawback to the general acceptance and popularity of the "Hungarian Concerto" is the extraordinary nature of this solo part, which abounds in difficulties essentially requiring a Joachim, or something like a Joachim, to overcome. This must always be more or less of a stumbling-block in the way of other violinists who would fain master the Concerto and perform it publicly. Nevertheless, the work must be taken as it is. The difficulties to which we refer were clearly not made for egotistical display; otherwise the solo phrases and bravura passages would not be so continually and artfully interwoven with the orchestral accessories, which form a part of them rather than figure as simple accompaniments. That Herr Joachim's performance of his Concerto was a wonderful exhibition of manipulative skill, no less than varied and poetical expression, every amateur knows. We have never heard him play it better, if, indeed, ever so well. The audience listened with eager attention—long as the Concerto is—from the first note to the last; and the applause at the end was a sign of genuine enthusiasm, just as was the "recall" which brought the gifted violinist back to the platform. Herr Joachim afterwards gave the largo and finale from J. S. Bach's Fifth Sonata for violin unaccompanied—how and with what effect need hardly be told to the many among our musical readers who have heard him play these unique studies at the Monday Popular Concerts. If Bach's violin solos were at one time thought to be scarcely possible of execution, Herr Joachim has shown that they are not only possible of execution, but possible to execute with ease and unerring fluency.

The vocal music at this concert was exceptionally good. Madame Elena Corani, who has just returned from America, sang the great scena of Leonora, from Fidelio, with real dramatic expression, as well as Schumann's "Frauenliebe-und-leben" (in English). Mr. W. H. Cummings gave the beautiful tenor song, from Mr. Henry Smart's too seldom heard Bride of Dunkerron, in his most finished and artistic manner, as well as an air from Cherubini's Anacreon—"Je n'ai besoin pour embellir ma vie,"—which made us wonder that, for half a century or more, scarcely anything but the overture to this once celebrated work has been heard in public.

At the next concert we are promised the eighth symphony and fourth concerto of Beethoven (pianist, Mr. Franklin Taylor); Cherubini's overture to Lodoiska; and Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's "Dramatic Fantasia for Orchestra"—Madame Otto Alvsleben and Signor Topai being the singers.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Mr. Arthur Chappell never fails to bring forward some of Beethoven's "Posthumous Quartets" during the time that Herr Joachim holds the first violin at these concerts. The gifted Hungarian is recognized as facile princeps in the art of interpreting the music which represents Beethoven's profoundest meditations; and it must be said for him that he justifies this, not only by masterful ability, but by a sympathy with his work obvious enough to make the impression upon others which is always possible where earnest feeling exists. Herr Joachim rarely, if ever, expounded Beethoven with greater skill than on Monday night, when leading a performance of the Quartet in C sharp minor. The composition itself is one of those in presence of which the tongue of criticism is silenced by a feeling of half-awe, half-amazement; or, at most, is able to only ejaculate—"Whence had this man these things?" A critic, indeed, standing on the very border of the work, once questioned the propriety of choosing such a key as C sharp minor, and had for answer the words of Montesquieu:—"Pour juger si Annibal fit une faut en allant à Capone il faudrait être Annibal." Hardly dare any man venture to judge these final utterances of the mighty mind which conceived the "Eroica," the "C minor," and the "Choral." The keenest sight has hitherto failed to discern all their beauties; and every fresh performance serves but to strengthen a conviction that their character for obscurity arises solely from a want of light in the observer. Herr Joachim was ably assisted in the Quartet by MM. Ries, Straus, and Piatti, the result being worthy both of the work and of the enthusiastic applause bestowed upon the performers by a gratified audience. Other concerted pieces in the programme were Schumann's Quintet for piano and strings, noticed in these columns a short time back, and Haydn's very charming Quartet in the same key (Op. 33). A good deal of Haydn's piquant humour is concentrated in the last movement of his Quartet; and it would be well if, another time, the work were placed in a better position than at the end of the concert. Mdme. Schumann, whose admiration for Brahms' music exceeds the admiration of many to whom it is less familiar, brought forward two "ballads" (so-called) for pianoforte by that master, and played them with an ability made more conspicuous than ever by earnestness. Each "ballad" contains several short movements, some of which are, at first hearing, more curious than beautiful. Brahms, however, is entitled to a patient judgment, if not yet to perfect confidence, and these specimens of his genius must become more familiar before their merits are finally decided. Mdme. Schumann also played Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E minor, it being possible to do so on the pianoforte without any alteration of the original. With Bach in hand Mdme. Schumann appeared at her best. Mr. Lloyd's rendering of "Dalla sua pace," and F. Clay's charming song, "The shades of evening close around," were agreeable features of a very excellent concert.

IRISH BALLAD CONCERT.

St. Patrick's Day was commemorated at Exeter Hall by a concert composed entirely of Irish melodies, the characteristic beauties of which received full effect from such interpreters as Mesdames Florence Lancia, Spiller, Williams; Messrs. Santley, Lester, &c. After the first two or three songs had been rendered to the evident satisfaction of the audience, a gentleman came forward and announced that although Mr. Sims Reeves' name was on the programme, he was unable to attend in consequence of a severe cold. No sooner was this announcement made than a scene of indescribable confusion ensued. The audience was ungallant enough to cause Miss Hillier to retire, and would not be satisfied until Mr. Santley appeared and sang Mr. Reeves' song in a manner which obtained marked attention from the hitherto turbulent auditory. This difficulty having been got over, the audience settled down to listen with satisfaction to the delivery of about thirty songs, melodies and ballads, derived principally from the works of Moore. Madame Lancia delivered Lover's "Angel's Whisper" in a manner which elicited an encore, responded to by "Kate Kearney." Mr. Santley sang the "Minstrel Boy," the "Legacy" and the "Cruiskeen Lawn," in perfection. Mr. Lester also proved an efficient aid in some ballads from the pen of Moore. Mr. Phasey played some excellent airs on the euphonium in an excellent manner; and a twin pair of extremely juvenile ladies exhibited their efficiency on the pianoforte. With the exception of the interruption alluded to, the concert proved a thorough success—thanks being due to the exertions of Messrs. Benedict, Williams and Sloper.

MADAME LAVROWSKA'S CONCERT.

But a few weeks ago found the accomplished Russian vocalist, Mdme. Lavrowska, making her initial bow before the English public, when the effect produced was such as to encourage hopes that she might make a lasting stay in the metropolis. The popularity of the talented lady increased upon each of the few occasions when she appeared in public, so that she was already a prominent favourite in the concert-room, while hopes were expressed and sanguine expectations entertained as to Mdme. Lavrowska's name appearing in one of the opera prospectuses for the ensuing season. These anticipations, however, were nipped in the bud by the announcement that she would give a farewell concert after so brief a period among us. The concert took place on Friday evening last at St. James Hall, when a large audience assembled to wish the bénéficiaire a speedy return to our shores. Mdme. Lavrowska took the entire vocal responsibility upon her own shoulders, her individual efforts being supported by instrumental selections contributed by Mdme. Norman-Néruda, Signor Piatti, and the Messrs. Le Jeune. The interest culminated in Mdme. Lavrowska's singing, as might be naturally expected. The songs selected were "Che faro," by Gluck, Russian airs by Glinka, Monuchko, and Dargomysky, Handel's "Dove sei amato bene." Schumann's lied, "Ich grolle nicht," and the brindisi from Lucrezia Borgia, "Il segreto per esser felice." In this varied selection the power and versatility of the artist were abundantly apparent; recall followed recall, and encore followed encore. Mdme. Néruda played an air with variations by Vieuxtemps, and Signor Piatti contributed a fantaisie of his own composition. The playing of the Le Jeunes, père et fils, was also much commended. Mdme. Lavrowska leaves us too soon, but will be assured of warm remembrance, and a hearty welcome whenever she visits us again.

VIENNA.—Dr. Schnitzler, who is very celebrated for his employment of the laryngoscope, and his skill in treating cases of hoarseness in singers, is about to give a course of lectures, in the Conservatory of the Society of the Friends of Music, on the physiology and pathology of the human voice. His lecture will be illustrated by anatomical preparations, and, also, by a living subject, the latter being no other than Herr Labatt of the Imperial Operahouse, who has kindly lent his throat to his friend, Dr. Schnitzler, for the occasion.—The new opera, Der Carneval in Rom, by Herr Johann Strauss, was successfully produced, on the 1st inst., at the Theater an der Wien, the composer himself conducting.

HAMBURG.—Herr Behrens, primo basso from the Operahouse in Berlin, has met with great success at the Stadttheater here. The Hamburger Fremdenblatt says: "After the brilliant début which Herr Behrens made as Tell in Rossini's opera, he sang on Saturday the part of Sarastro in Mozart's Zauberflöte, when his noble voice and fine acting met with fullest appreciation. Herr Behrens' masterly conception of the part, which, musically as well as dramatically, was unique in the highest degree, could not fail to draw forth the most enthusiastic applause after each scena, and he was obliged to sing Sarastro's grand Aria no less than three times. Herr Behrens will probably be in London next season, on a visit to his sister, who, as Mdme. Elvira Behrens, is most favourably known and remembered in musical circles.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

The last of the series of these highly popular entertainments, for the plan of which Mr. John Boosey deserves as much credit as he has apparently achieved success by judicious and spirited exertion, took place last Wednesday evening, bringing to a triumphant close the seventh season since their first inauguration. Mr. Sims Reeves, on whom the director had counted for so many successive concerts, was at length sufficiently recovered from the indisposition which had for so long interrupted his valuable services to take his share in the programme. He contributed two new songs, winding up with "My pretty Jane," in which he, as usual, roused to the highest pitch the enthusiasm of his hearers—expressed in cheers and vain "encores." After exhibiting his voice in a condition of vigour and freshness which showed it proof alike against time and season, he tantalisingly, but with commendable prudence, refused to obey the flattering clamour of his hearers for one taste more of its charming quality. Of the new songs, the first, "Thinking of thee," by Blumenthal, who accompanied it on the pianoforte, was the more pleasingly and musicianly. Its softly flowing melody was delivered with that exquisite delicacy of light and shade, truth and force of expression, and masterly phrasing, which distinguish our great tenor, even when clearly reserving his full powers; and, indeed, to hear Mr. Sims Reeves sing, when, as on this occasion, compelled to avoid laying his voice under any strain, is a lesson in itself of skilful control over the organ and acquired tact in moderating its exercise, producing perfect tone, and every requisite shade of expression, with the least expenditure of physical power. The words of this song, by Miss Augusta Webster, deserve praise for the simplicity of their sentiment and the effective colour of the picture they present in harmony with it. The second song, "My beautiful, good night" by Mr. Jackman, was graceful, but wanting in breadth for a concert room. Mr. Santley, who has consistently been a stalwart support to these concerts, shone with undiminished lustre. Blumenthal's "Sweet is true love;" a new and spirited nautical effusion by Mr. J. V. Bridgeman, brimming over with patriotism, and capitally set by Mr. J. L. Hatton—"The British Tar;" "The Men of Harlech," provided with nobly-sounding words, by Mr. J. Oxenford, and, when encored, followed by "The King and I," were the contributions of the popular barytone, who stirred the audience to those hearty and unanimous demonstrations to which he is so well accustomed. Mdme. Patey displayed her fine voice in Mr. Gatty's "Unspoken" (encored); Sullivan's "Golden days;" "Hunting-tower," which, receiving an encore, was followed by "The Minstrel Boy," and "As it fell upon a day"—the last in conjunction with Miss Edith Wynne, for whom an apology was made in the course of the second part, but who had previously won well-deserved applause for her delivery of two Welsh ballads from Brinley Richards' new collection, and Lover's song, "The Angel's Whisper." Miss Jenny Pratt rendered good service in Smart's charming "Lady of the Lea," bringing down hearty and well deserved plaudits. A new composition by Mr. W. F. Taylor, to admirable words by C. L. Kenney, "Love and tears," and "Charlie is my Darling," completed this lady's quota to the programme of the evening. Mr. Henry Guy, a rising singer, with a voice of pure and agreeable quality, and trained in a good school, was also heard several times, and made a favourable impression. Mr. Sydney Smith's brilliant pianoforte playing, which drew down a loud "encore" for his charming and sparkling bagatelle, called "Golden Bells," and two performances of the London Orpheus Quartett, filled up the liberal measure of the entertainment,

Two extra Ballad Concerts are announced—one in the morning, or rather afternoon, of Monday, March 24, at which Mr. Sims Reeves is to sing, and another on the evening of the following Wednesday, with the special view of benefitting Mr. J. L. Hatton—promoted by the popular tenor, in conjunction with Mr. Santley, whose respectful solicitation for patronage on behalf of their "old friend" is pretty sure of meeting with eager and ample response.

PESTH.—For some time past it has been generally known that the Abbate Franz Liszt intended giving a concert for the benefit of his old friend Robert Franz. The concert came off on the 5th inst., in the large room of the Hôtel Hungaria, where the Abbate has so frequently attracted the élite of Pesth society to hear him. The piano was decorated with laurel. The majority of the audience was composed of members of the Hungarian aristocracy. The great feature of the evening was the Abbate's performance of Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 26, and the "Soirée de Vienne," No. 4, both pieces being received with frantic demonstrations of delight. It seemed as though the applause would never end, so, at length, the Abbate returned to the piano, and gratified his shouting and stamping admirers with an extra piece, in the shape of an Improvisation on songs by Franz and Schumann. The concert commenced with Beethoven's Sestet, Op. 81*b*. Mdme. Semsey sang three songs by Franz and Schumann. The strictly musical proceedings were diversified by a short lecture of Professor Gotthard Wöhler's on the significance of Franz as a musician.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1873.

A LITTLE while ago, we referred to the undoubted advance made of late by what is known as the Modern School of Music, the school in which effects are chiefly sought from harmonic combinations, tone-colour, and a liberal use of the resources supplied by rhythm and modulation. From an exaltation of melody, musical fashion has passed to the exaltation of that which at one time attended upon melody. We will not complain of this, because it would be absurd to suppose that the art can make no legitimate development in the direction it is now taking. Every "movement" recorded in history, no matter how extravagant in form, or harmful in immediate effect, has left behind some contribution towards the lasting benefit of the human race; and, taught by the past, it is easy to watch the present tendency of music, not only with equanimity but with some degree of satisfaction. In this respect, as in all others, the truth ultimately prevails. Rivers, like the Nile, may overflow their banks, but the general balance of Nature's forces is always too strong for spasmodic energy, and they never fail to return to their prescribed place, after having fertilized the land. We believe, then, in the benefit to music which will eventually spring from its latest development. To use another illustration—the "advanced musicians" of our day are like the pioneers who add fresh provinces to the domain of civilisation, though scarcely civilized themselves. When these have explored and cleared the wilderness, an ordered society comes in with its laws, and takes possession. So will the new school of composers pave the way for men who know how to employ new resources in harmony with the fixed principles of art. But none the less should young musicians be warned that art has such principles, by which they must regulate their work, or lose their wage. It is, no doubt, very fine to talk about the "liberty which is perfect freedom," and to picture the youthful composer, writing down what he takes to be inspirations, unfettered by rule. But all this is as much nonsense as the dreams of youth usually are. Every art has its laws, respecting which there can be no more question than is possible with regard to the wrongfulness of theft or the virtue of charity.

The power of exciting pleasurable emotion, and many other qualities easily discoverable, are essential things from which music cannot be dissevered. Any of them may pass out of fashion for a time, but they return as by the action of a natural law, which accident had momentarily suspended.

We have been led to make the foregoing remarks by an extract from an article which appeared at the time of Boieldieu's death from the pen of Adolphe Adam, who was, at one time, a pupil of the composer of La Dame Blanche. The extract referred to is an instructive confession, and we make no apology for translating it. Says M. Adam:—

When I had the honour to become a member of Boieldieu's class, I was like most other young men who begin composing; show was everything, a good foundation nothing. I had great esteem for modulations and eccentric transitions; and a lofty contempt for melody, which I thought of small account. A friend once took me to the Bouffes to hear Rossini's Barbière, and I came away after the first act, furious with a public which could applaud such stuff. It was with these tendencies that I joined Boieldieu's class. The master asked me to prepare him an exercise; and, two days after, I took him a stupid piece, which had neither tune nor rhythm; but, in revenge, strange sharps and flats, while not two bars were in the same key. "My friend," said Boieldieu, when he had looked at my exercise, "what is this trying to say?" "Sir," I exclaimed indignantly, "do you not see these modulations, these harmonic transitions?" "Yes," he answered, "I see all that; but the essentials—tonality and theme! Go to your piano, write an exercise in two or three parts, twenty bars long, without modulation, and bring it to me in eight days." "But," I cried, "I can do that at once." "No," he answered; "eight days will not be too many." I went home, laughing at such absurdity, and set to work; but, owing to a habit of allowing my imagination to seek its own object, I could not find a single melodic idea. At the end of eight days I showed the master my piece, which was feeble enough. "Good," said Boieldieu; "at least that has a human form, but it lacks much. Keep at the work for some time yet." He would not allow me to do anything else for three years; and then he said, "Study orchestration and scenic effects, and you will do."

We may leave this little bit of M. Adam's experience without note or comment. It conveys its own lesson.

THE LATE JOHN LODGE ELLERTON.

THIS admirable English amateur—or rather professor of music, for he was more of a musician than many who make music their exclusive study—was born in the early part of the present century. Mr. Ellerton was educated at Rugby, when Dr. Woolls was head master. He had already attained considerable efficiency as a performer on the pianoforte. He composed, while at school, several pieces, vocal and instrumental, but none of them were committed to the press. In 1828 he took his degree as M.A. at Brasenose College, Oxon. During his residence at the University, a set of quadrilles and two or three songs were published, and obtained for him a reputation which extended far beyond the academical limits within which he was recognized, as an amateur musician, foremost among his contemporaries. On the completion of his collegiate career, Mr. Ellerton visited Italy, where he resided for two years, chiefly at Rome. Here he studied counterpoint under the most famous masters of the period.

From 1828, up to the time of his decease, Mr. Ellerton was an assiduous student and prolific worker in his art, to which he contributed in every style and every department of composition. Songs, sacred and secular; stringed quintets and quartets; symphonies; operas, Italian, German and French; an oratorio—Paradise Lost; a Stabat Mater (published at Brussels in December, 1872); Masses, Motets and Sanctuses; besides many English Anthems and Hymns. Thorough musical scholarship, with melody the most graceful, varied and pathetic, characterize these various essays; and of Mr. Ellerton, as a composer, it may be said with truth:—

"Nullum scribendi genus non tetigit;
Nullum quod tetigit non ornavit."

Among the distinguished amateurs with whom he was associated, artistically, and with whom he lived on terms of personal friendship were—the late Lord Westmoreland, Sir John Rogers, Lord Saltoun, Sir Andrew Barnard, &c.; among professors with whom he was no less intimate were—Mr. W. Knyvett, Sir Henry Bishop, Mr. Tom Cooke, Herr Wagner, Mr. Henry Blagrove, and many others of both classes and various nationalities—of recent years more especially Germany and Belgium.

Mr. Ellerton died almost suddenly. On the 31st of December he was at the Athenæum and Carlton Clubs, in his usual health and spirits. On Friday, the 3rd of January, at midnight, he departed this life, to the unspeakable regret of a very large circle of friends and acquaintances—by all of whom he was greatly esteemed, honoured, and admired as a musician, while not less loved and respected as a man.

The Director of the Musical Union, in a paragraph of his "Record," which appeared in the year in which the Duke of Leinster undertook the Presidency of that time-respected institution, paid the following tribute to the amateur-musician—or musician-amateur—whose loss we now deplore:—

"This gentlemen, also a new member of the Committee, is the author of a volume of elegant poetry; and has published two masses, seven anthems, fourteen glees (two of which have gained the prize at the Catch Club), nineteen duets, sixty-five songs, a pianoforte trio and quartet, three quartets for stringed instruments, and one quintet (Op. 100) for two violoncellos, two violins, and viola. The vocal compositions of Mr. Ellerton that we have heard and examined are distinguished by a nice discrimination in the adaptation of the poetry to appropriate music, and the scores of his concerted instrumental compositions exhibit a fertility of elegant ideas, and a facility of part-writing quite remarkable. From the number and excellence of his various published and unpublished works, Mr. Ellerton is entitled to the highest place among amateurs of this country, and the accession of such an accomplished poet and musician to the number of practical amateurs in the Committee is a compliment of which we are very proud."

Nothing could be more appropriate.

It is reported that Dr. ——, of the Java (Cunard line to New York), has resigned his very responsible position in that ship. All musical artists travelling from this side of the Atlantic to the other will hope that this report may be without foundation. Madame Rudersdorff, Madame Arabella Goddard, &c., have good reason to remember with gratitude the Doctor's unremitting attention to them during their voyage to America in June, 1872, when bound for Mr. Gilmore's notorious Boston International Festival.

Mr. Gye.—We much regret to learn that Mr. Gye is lying ill at Vienna. While returning from Italy homewards last week he was suddenly seized with acute inflammation of the joints of the right foot, and has been unable to leave his bed for several days.

Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise and Rossini's Stabat Mater are the works selected for performance by the Sacred Harmonic Society, at their Subscription Concert, on Friday next. The principal vocalists will be Mdme. Sinico, Mdme. Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. Sir Michael Costa will, as usual, conduct.

NEWS FROM A STAR.

A very curious and suggestive volume, called Another World, has lately come under the eye of Mr. Punch. It is what may be called a Romance of Satire, and unlike most books that are intended to do two things at once, it effects both. The scene is laid in another Star than our own, as the following morceau will prove:—

"The women are instructed in our planet as to the art of pleasing, and the handsomest and most gifted exert themselves to this end. They are required to attend to their personal appearance abroad and at home. The married especially are enjoined to attend to this as much in the presence of their husbands as before strangers. A different custom prevailed in former times, when women, after they had been some time married, thinking their husband's affection was secured, gave themselves no further care to please him, though still taking pains to appear handsome and fascinating to others. It was for visitors and strangers that the most comely apparel and the most engaging manners were put on; the consequence was, that the husband often preferred the society of those who, in appearance at least, seemed to care more for him than did his own wife."

Well, yes, there is something to be said for Another World. But taking into consideration present prices of feminine apparel, we think that our own system is the best—certainly the most economical. If the beloved ones of our bosoms came down to the domestic dinner every day, arrayed in their war-paint, what they would gain by our admiration of their charms they would lose on our investigation of our cheque-books. Every star its own system. Yet we should like to see the arrangements so daintily described in the book in question; for see how the ladies of that world dress their hair. What does Le Follet say to this?—

"In the hair is sometimes worn an ornament forming two wings, each consisting of a single diamond, which moves on small fine hinges, and is so arranged that the least breath of air will set it in motion. In the centre, uniting the two wings, is a small crimson stone, surmounted by a large stone of purple-blue, from which sprouts out a very fine dagger of a greenish gold colour. The rest of the head-dress is made of fine metal, chosen for its lightness, of the same tints. These metals are of equal, perhaps greater value than gold, but are chosen for their qualities. The necklace and anklets correspond in character to the head-dress, with the addition to the former of one large pearl, which hangs to the wings, and rests on the lady's bosom." Punch.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

The National Ballad Concerts, held every week, under the guidance of Mr. Ralph Percy, at St. George's Hall, are gaining favour. On Tuesday last the programme was varied and pleasing. The concert opened with a duet of Glover's, sung by Miss Matilda Scott of the London Academy of Music, and Mdme. Barrington. Mdme. Francis gave the old English ballad, "The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington" and "Norah's Courtship;" while Miss Blanche Rieves, in Balfe's popular Irish song, "Killarney," created quite a furore. Mdme. Barrington, in the new contralto song of "The Beacon," displayed her voice to advantage. Mr. Ralph Percy, in the late M. Ascher's popular song, "Alice, where art thou?" gained a double encore. He also sang "The Thorn." Mr. Chaplin Henry displayed his fine voice in a descriptive song, "The Schooner on the sands," accompanied by the composer. Miss Maggie Lewis and Mr. Henry Gordon contributed some songs; and Mr. Bonnay, on an instrument called the "Xylophon," played a selection from William Tell. Mr. M. Watson presided at the pianoforte.

M. Gustave Pradeau's first "Historical Pianoforte Recital" took place on Tuesday evening, at the Hanover Square Rooms. M. Pradeau is a pianist of consummate ability. He gave "La Villageoise," and "La Poule," by Rameau, two old compositions which did not please much upon acquaintance, (one felt that the ideas, the tone of feeling, as well as the forms, were of the past,) and a "pièce" by Scarlatti, a genuine artistic composition, which was capitally played by M. Pradeau, who next gave P. E. Bach's Sonata in B flat major. It is not a great work, is somewhat formal and old-fashioned in its cut, and the ideas are not remarkably striking, but it is, nevertheless, interesting. M. Pradeau played it perfectly. His other solos were an "Allemande" by Handel, "Polonaise" by W. F. Bach, and a "Gigue" by J. S. Bach, all of which were much applauded. M. Pradeau had the valuable assistance of M. Sainton in Haydn's Sonata in D major, for pianoforte and violin, and the talented French violinist also played J. S. Bach's Violin Sonata in C minor in a manner worthy of his fame. His performances were deservedly rewarded with loud applause. Miss Julia Wigan was the vocalist, and sang with much expression "With verdure clad" and "When the silver moon." As a whole the recital was enjoyable and pleasing. Mr. Thouless presided at the Pianoforte.

Mdlle. Elvira del Bianco, a most talented artist, gave a soirée on Wednesday evening at the Beethoven Rooms, which was fully attended. She played, with Messrs. Henry Holmes and Pezze, Beethoven's grand trio, Op. 70, and Mendelssohn's trio in D; of which two charming compositions she proved herself an accomplished and clever exponent. She also played, as solos, four old Italian compositions by Frescobaldi, Sulli, Pergolesi, and Scarlatti, all of which were admirably interpreted. Fumagalli's "La Villanelle" displayed her executive powers to advantage; and she closed the concert with a brilliant waltz, composed by herself, entitled "Margherita." Mdlle. Bianco was assisted, vocally, by Mdme. and M. Danieli and Signor Monari-Rocca; who sang, capitally, several popular Italian pieces by Rossini and Mozart with success. Signor Fiori presided at the pianoforte with his well-known ability; his talent as an accompanist of vocal music is patent.

PROVINCIAL.

Liverpool.—We take the subjoined from the Liverpool Porcupine:—

"The annual concert of Miss Kate Haddock, which took place at the Hardman Street Assembly Rooms, on Thursday evening, was a distinguished success so far as the appreciation of a select audience could make it so. There was no pandering to popular 'taste' in the programme, which was compiled from the works of Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Hummel, &c. The young lady was assisted by her father, the well-known and respected violoncellist, and by Mr. E. W. Thomas, leader of the Philharmonic Society band. The vocalist was Madame Bellinie Porter, and the accompanist, Mr. Franklin Haworth. Miss Haddock is a thoroughly accomplished pianist. Her mechanism is perfect, and she has evidently been trained in the best school. Her one solo was Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 29, in G, which she played with great care and finish. In any town where music was under healthier influences than, unfortunately, govern it in Liverpool, such competent performers as Miss Haddock and her father, and the talented artistes who assisted them on Thursday evening, would be more frequently before the public."

The following appeared in the Liverpool Daily Post:—

"The choirs of Liverpool have warmly taken up the proposal to compete at the Crystal Palace National Music Meetings. The applications sent in to Mr. Hawkins are said to far exceed anticipations, and the committee will experience no difficulty in selecting a choir of 120 voices well calculated to show that music has a place in Liverpool. The only difficulty in the way is the financial one, but this will, no doubt, be soon overcome. To defray the expenses of taking a choir to London about £500 is needed, and scarcely half this amount has been raised. Well-to-do lovers of music should really assist this movement, and give Liverpool singers a chance of pitting their vocal powers against those of other choirs. The Philharmonic Society should do something in this matter. Mr. Robertson Gladstone delights in the encouragement of native talent; there is now an opportunity to give musical art a stimulus in Liverpool."

Edinburgh.—The Daily Review gives some information about one or two of Mr. Mapleson's new artists, which must, of course, be taken quantum valeat:—

"Mdlle. Ostava Torriani, who appeared for the first time in Edinburgh, did not give her hearers much opportunity of judging of her powers, for she only appeared in one solo, 'Caro nome,' from Verdi's Rigoletto, and in a quartet, 'Un di si ben' from the same opera, along with Mdlle. Macvitz and Signori Cantoni and Del Puente. A duet with Signor Del Puente was omitted without any explanation being offered. Any attempt to form an estimate of Mdlle. Torriani's powers under such circumstances must necessarily be worth very little. She sang, however, with great ease, evincing much self-possession of manner and abundant skill as an executant. It did not appear to us that she threw much expression into her vocalization, but, on the other hand, it is fair to say that there was in the music itself very little scope for the display of feeling. Her voice is a strong and clear soprano, of considerable range and great apparent flexibility, and if supported by adequate histrionic powers and technical skill, should make her equal to most operatic rôles. Mdlle. Macvitz confirmed the impression we had formed on her first appearance here, that she possesses a voice of great strength and quality, and an excellent style. Her single solo, a cavatina from Mercadante's Giuramento, was not, however, a very happy choice, and, though excellently rendered, produced little effect. Mdlle. Macvitz took her share in the quartet with Mdlle. Torriani and Signori Cantoni and Del Puente very creditably, throwing more animation into her style than we had before seen her exhibit."

Professor Oakeley gave one of his enjoyable organ recitals, on the 14th, in the Music Class-room, to a crowded audience. The various organ pieces and adaptations were admirably played, and seemed to be generally appreciated. The favourite Gavotte, by Gluck, was repeated in reply to an encore. A notice appeared on the programme that at the next organ performance the selection will be from the programme of the annual University concert, which takes place on Monday, March 24.

Greenock.—The local Advertiser (March 18) thus refers to some Quartet Concerts lately given by Mr. Carrodus:—

"We have already called the attention of our readers to the above Chamber Concerts, and now that the first three of the series have taken place, we are enabled to speak even more positively of the admirable performances of Mr. Carrodus and his party. Last week's programme comprised no less than six entire quartets—two of Beethoven's, two of Haydn's, one of Mozart's, and one of Mendelssohn's. These were all performed so perfectly that anything like detailed notice could only be a repetition of the same statement as to each. Their enjoyment and appreciation by the audience was evident, and of so hearty a nature, that we cannot avoid congratulating ourselves on having still some taste for good music in our midst, despite occasional appearances of late years to the contrary. A great feature of each concert is the violin solo by Mr. Carrodus, whose thorough mastery over the instrument is too well known to require remark from us. Last week his solos comprised Gounod's Meditation on Bach's first prelude, the same composer's celebrated Chaconne, (a marvellous performance, which we hope to hear repeated before the series ends,) and De Beriot's solo on the opening Thema of the Kreutzer Sonata. Mr. Boatwright, the violoncellist, also delighted the audience with three charming solos, excellently given, and Messrs. Carrodus and Earnshaw played three violin duets. It will thus be seen that last week's 'bill of fare' was a very tempting as well as a very high-class one. The programmes for this week's concerts—to-night's and Friday evening's—are now before us, and these, if possible, even exceed the previous ones in attractive items.

Coalbrookdale.—The very interesting concert given at the Literary Institution last Tuesday week, under the direction of the eminent pianist, Mrs. John Macfarren, from London, attracted a good and appreciative audience, despite the inclement state of the weather. The varied programme included several compositions by the greatest composers, and some well-chosen selections from the best writers of the present day. Not only were the brilliant pianoforte solos executed with the utmost finish by Mrs. John Macfarren, whose keen appreciation of the beautiful in art and consummate mastery of mechanical difficulties, enable her to do justice to all she undertakes, but every effect was given to the vocal pieces by the charming singing of Miss Agnes Drummond and Miss Alice Barnett.

MANCHESTER (From a Correspondent).—Mr. Horton C. Allison gave his "Fifth Annual Pianoforte Recital," at the Memorial Hall, on the 11th inst., to one of the most brilliant assemblies seen at any concert here this season. Since Mr. Allison won the first prize as a pianist and composer at the Leipsic Conservatoire, he has often distinguished himself by performances justifying the honour conferred upon him, but never more so than on Tuesday evening by his playing of the following—Part I.—Sonata (D minor), Beethoven; Air in F, Scarlatti; Prelude and Fugue (C minor), Bach; Romance (A flat), Mozart; Gigue (E minor), Handel; Gavotte in A, Gluck; Lieder ohne Worte, Mendelssohn; Scherzo Brillante, Wollenhaupt; The Sigh and War March, Allison. Part II.—Impromptu, Schubert; Grande Valse, Chopin; Elégie, Gade; Capricietto, Reinecke; Kreisleriana, Schumann; Romance and Etude, Henselt; Caprice, Raff; The Sea Song, Mountain Melody, and "Le Fantôme," Allison; Grand Fantasia on Wagner's Tannhäuser, Liszt. The Sonata by Beethoven, one of that master's grandest and most difficult, was played by Mr. Allison entirely from memory, as, indeed, were all the pieces in the programme. The performance lasted two hours, and proved that there is an English pianist who can equal, if not excel, the feats of memory reported of Herr von Bulow, or, indeed, any other living pianist; and it is certain that a better rendering of the above works, apart from this element in their performance, has not been heard in Manchester for many years past. Mr. Allison was greatly applauded after every number, and was encored in Mendelssohn's Two Songs without Words, and in his own compositions, "The Sigh" and "Le Champ de Mars," a very spirited war march. "The Sea Song," "Mountain Melody," and "Le Fantôme," also proved very favourable examples of Mr. Allison's ability as a composer.

PAULINE LUCCA AS MIGNON.

(From the "Boston Daily Globe.")

We cannot find words to express the refined delight that Mdme. Lucca's impersonation of Mignon afforded us. Here, as in Marguerite, she held her audience spell-bound, and repeatedly thrilled them into the most excited and demonstrative enthusiasm. If Mdme. Lucca were not the glorious singer she is, if her magnificent voice had but a moiety of its wonderful power, sympathy and richness, her splendid acting would win for her the highest admiration. It is true, on the other hand, if she were an indifferent actress, her superb singing would justify the most lavish encomiums. But such acting and such singing are so rarely found combined in one artist, that the possessor of them may be almost looked upon in the light of an anomaly.

Mdme. Lucca's interpretation of this part is equal in all respects to her Marguerite, and in some superior. It is a wonderfully consistent effort throughout, inexpressibly touching in its tender sadness. In Madame Lucca's hands Mignon is a little savage, whose spirit has been crushed by cruelty and harsh usage. She is so accustomed to blows that she shrinks away even from strangers, not knowing how soon their hands may fall with violence upon her. She is a wretched little waif, without friends, without hope—until she loves, when her whole nature becomes changed. From that moment she lives but in the presence of him who has won her heart by kindness. She devours him with her eyes, she worships him, she is his slave. There is nothing of the high-spirited woman in her nature; she is simply humble and grateful. How exquisitely Mdme. Lucca develops these features defies description. There is gratitude in every yearning glance, in every restless motion of the hands, in every tone of the voice. The sustained pathos of the entire conception is surprisingly beautiful. In the duet with Guglielmo, in the first act, where he questions her regarding her family, Mdme. Lucca gave a foretaste of the countless beauties that were to follow. He tells her that he will be far from her on the morrow. The faint murmur, half spoken and half sung, with which Mignon echoes "to-morrow," was supremely pathetic in its expressiveness, as were the succeeding lines, "Who knows where we shall be to-morrow?" They were full of the woe of the poor girl who had seen a glimpse of light before her, and was to lose it for evermore. In its utter helplessness and despair it spoke of a whole lifetime of patient sorrow. Another exquisite point was made in the same scene, where Guglielmo asks her whither she would wend her way if he were to purchase her liberty. She closed her eyes dreamily, and, extending her hands, murmured the aria, "Know'st thou the land." It was plain that she was recalling a scene that lingered indistinctly, like a half-forgotten dream, in her memory. She was calling back a time before she was steeped in such abject misery, and, as she dwells upon it, she gradually awakens to a sublime rapture, and forgets the wretchedness of the present in the sweet oblivion of the tender retrospection. There was a refined thoughtfulness in the whole treatment of this scene that would alone have stamped Mdme. Lucca as a great artist. It deserves to take a foremost rank among her finest efforts. Again, when she hears of her freedom, the childish joy with which she clasps her hands and the sweet smile that lights up her face were charming in their exuberance; and there was something so unconventional, so fresh, so deliciously natural in the whole of the scene that follows, where she tells Lotario of her happiness, that the audience broke forth into an uncontrollable and spontaneous round of applause. Her jealousy of Filina, when Guglielmo pays her attention, was a very pretty piece of acting, blended, as its fretful annoyance was, with sadness; and the girlish outburst of gratitude, when the man she so loves gives his consent for her to accompany him, though full of rapture, was made exquisitely suggestive, in its humility, of the ill-used and broken creature upon whom kindness has been so seldom bestowed that the sacrifice of her life would not prove too great a recompense for it.

In the scene in the second act, where Mignon accompanies Guglielmo to Filina's apartments, disguised as his page, Mdme. Lucca was beyond all praise. Her by-play, as she listens to Guglielmo making love to Filina, was very charming. It was quite undemonstrative, but it was full of quiet pathos. The air before the glass, "Un giorno il giovinetto," was superbly sung and acted. The attempt to stifle her grief, the simulated joy, the reckless boisterousness, which is at length overpowered by the anguish at her heart, were finely contrasted. Mdme. Lucca's superb voice was heard with magnificent effect in this number. Its massive volume, its rich quality, its wonderful power and its glorious brilliancy were never heard here in such perfection before. The elaborate cadenza with which it concluded was given with superb distinctness and fluency, and one of the runs, which exhibited the full compass of her voice, absolutely electrified the audience, who scarcely waited for the end of the air, to give vent to a perfect whirlwind of applause. We have only space to refer to the fine display of power that marked the expression of her hatred for Filina; to the tender grief and eloquent action with which she tells Guglielmo she must bid him farewell; to the utter hopelessness with which she sinks to the earth, overmastered by grief when contemplating suicide; to the bitter anguish of a woman maddened by jealousy and slighted love, with which she confides her sorrows to Lotario, and to the impetuous, thrilling grandeur with which she hurls her wild curse upon the place that has witnessed her woes. The quiet repose of her acting in the last act was also extremely beautiful, and her singing had a fascinating charm in its sympathetic expressiveness. The dawning of memory, as Mignon recognizes the scene where her early days were passed, and the grand outburst of joy as she rushes to her father's arms, were only surpassed in the beauty of their execution by the noble exaltation that throbbed in her last rapturous pæan. The whole impersonation was grand in conception, exquisite in execution, and incomparably beautiful in its entire and almost too faithful naturalness. We almost despair of again seeing an artist of such unequalled powers. This notice would not be complete if we did not mention that Mdme. Lucca was called before the curtain at the end of each act, in the midst of almost unbounded enthusiasm.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The next Students' Concert is announced to take place on Thursday evening next, at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, instead of at the Institution in Tenterden Street, where the concerts have usually been held. Subscribers, members and associates are to retain their accustomed privileges.

H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES has graciously signified his intention, through General Sir William Knollys, of presiding at the anniversary festival of the Royal Society of Musicians of Great Britain. The date is uncertain, but will probably be at the commencement of June.

POTSDAM.—The members of the Gesangverein, or Vocal Union, now established 58 years, celebrated, on the 28th February, in the Barberini Palace, the anniversary of its foundation. The members sang, under the direction of their conductor, Herr Ferdinand Wendel, a Hymn by Hauptmann, and Gade's Comala, the solos being taken by Mdlle. Boos and Herr Schock, from Berlin. The Lady gave, also, a song by Mendelssohn, and one by Wüerst. The concert was followed by a performance of the farce, Ein moderner Barbar, the characters being sustained by distinguished amateurs. The whole proceedings wound up with a ball.

MUNICH.—The Hof- und National Theater (Court and National Theatre), has been the first in Germany to give a benefit for the Grand-National-Festival-Stage-Play-Theatre at Bayreuth. The opera selected was Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg, and the performance came off on the 28th February. The house was crowded, and the whole of the receipts, without any deduction whatever, were handed over to the Musician of the Future. The cast of the opera was not quite the same as at first. Herr Fischer sang Hans Sachs instead of Herr Kindermann; and Herr Meyer, Beckmesser, instead of Herr Sigl. Hrer Levi conducted.

LA FILLE DE MDME. ANGOT.

Writing on Feb. 26, the Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph said:—

"To remain at home on Mardi Gras would have been a disgrace; so I resolved to be in the fashion, and was fortunate enough to secure a stall at the Folies Dramatiques, where a new opéra-bouffe was produced a few nights ago—new to Paris, that is to say, but not altogether new to the footlights, seeing that for many weeks it has drawn crowds to the Alcazar of Brussels. This enterprise of the Belgian theatres, by the bye, is one of the strangest signs of the times. Tannhäuser was produced at the Théâtre de la Monnaie last week, and several Parisian newspapers actually despatched their musical critics to witness the performance—an instance of journalistic enterprise almost without precedent. To return to La Fille de Madame Angot, its success was so great in Brussels that special performances, concluding at an early hour, were arranged on purpose to enable the amateurs of the neighbouring towns to be present. It is not by any means hazardous to prophecy that the success of the piece in Paris will equal that achieved in Belgium. The story is pretty, the music very charming, and the performance excellent. Strange to say, there is nothing—either in the plot or the words—to shock the most sensitive mind; and the success of a decent piece at the Folies Dramatiques, the répertoire of which is more than equivocal, is the most eloquent possible tribute to the intrinsic beauty of the music. Indeed, I have no hesitation in saying that the last success of this theatre, Abelard et Heloïse, could not possibly be seen by any woman who made the slenderest pretensions to modesty. The story of La Fille de Madame Angot is drawn from the stirring times of the Directory. Madame Angot, the famous dame de la Halle, does not herself appear upon the scene. It is on the fortunes of her daughter that the plot turns. Clairette has been adopted by the dames and the forts de la Halle, and is about to be married to one Pomponnet, a barber. She does not quite dislike her betrothed, but she decidedly prefers Ange Pitou, the celebrated chansonnier, who is put in prison every week for singing treasonable songs, and who, after a few hours, is invariably released. But Clairette does not dare brave the anger of her many-headed papa and many-voiced mamma; so she is obliged to have recourse to stratagem in order to adjourn the ceremony, for which she, her bridegroom, and her sponsors are all ready attired. Desperate needs beget desperate remedies. She picks up a treasonable song, composed by Ange Pitou, but sold by him to Larivandière, a financier, who is therein lampooned, and who therefore buys the satirical effusion for 30,000 crowns; and she sings it in the market-place, for the mere purpose of being arrested and taken off to prison. This forms the finale of the first act. The second takes place in the salon of Mdlle. Lange, the reigning favourite of Larivandière, and the protectress of Ange Pitou, with whom, though unknown to him, she is in love. Hearing that a girl has been arrested for singing a song in her dispraise, she desires the culprit to be brought before her, and recognises in Clairette an old schoolfellow. Mdlle. Lange has also sent for Ange Pitou to try to win him over to her cause; but the complication which seems inevitable is averted for the moment by the arrival of a party of Royalist conspirators, of whom the actress is the head and front. They have been traced, however, and the military rush in to seize the traitors. But Mdlle. Lange's ready wit comes to their aid. She protests that her company only form a wedding party, and that Clairette and Agne Pitou are the happy pair; and she succeeds in persuading the officers to join in the revelry. This forms the finale to Act II. The third is played outside a public garden at Belleville, whither Clairette has convoked all the dramatis personæ by a series of anonymous letters, in order that she may there unmask coram publico the treachery of her schoolfellow and of the chansonnier. This she easily succeeds in doing; and, on her triumph and final acceptance of Pomponnet, who, in the course of the piece, has been imprisoned, and has suffered numberless hardships on her behalf, the curtain falls.

"The music, embroidered by M. Lecocq on this theme, is simply charming, from the first note to the last. The melodies, while invariably spontaneous and unforced, are striking enough to catch the general ear at once; and after each act you hear everybody humming the salient airs. The piece is helped somewhat by a little spice of political allusion, giving zest to a performance which, without it, would be certain to be popular. Thus, there is a song for Clairette, with a refrain, 'Ce n'était pas la peine, assurement, de changer de Gouvernement,' which the audience, with an enthusiasm seldom seen in a French theatre, actually called for a fourth time. A phrase given to Ange Pitou, 'Depuis que nous avous la liberte, je suis toujours en prison,' also evoked significant cheers. But there is more than enough, apart from politics, to make the piece popular. There is a chorus of conspirators, which is as pretty in a musical sense as it is irresistibly comic from a dramatic point of view. A duet, too, for the two women, wherein they repeat what they call a 'catechism of the market,' is exceedingly funny; an imitation by Clairette of the tone of voice of the dames de la Halle led to this duet being twice encored. Then the finale to the second act, with a most captivating waltz tune, had to be repeated, although the curtain had already fallen; and the same fate befell a quarrelling duet at the very end of the opera. So genuine a success, in fine, I do not remember to have witnessed for a long time. The performance was a curiosity, inasmuch as it was musically admirable, although there was not a singer in the piece who had a really good voice. The best is possessed by Mdlle. Paola Marié, who has had, moreover, evidently a real musical eduation, and whose sense of humour has the genuine ring. The orchestral part of the score is of even more importance than the vocal, and it was played to perfection by a small but perfectly competent band; and every costume of the quaint kind in vogue under the reign of the Directory was correct to the minutest detail. To give such a performance with such means, most praiseworthy care and industry must have been expended."

MARIE KREBS.

(From an Occasional Correspondent.)

Mdlle. Marie Krebs was taken rather seriouly ill lately, after returning from a highly successful tour. It is not unlikely that her illness was, to a great extent, the result of the hard work she went through during the tour. At the beginning of last month, she received, by telegraph, an invitation from the Duke of Saxe-Coburg to play at the Court Concert on the 4th February. The Duke and Duchess were delighted with her performance, and overwhelmed her with praise. At the Duke's wish, she played the next day at a concert in the Theatre. The Duke conferred on her the Medal for Art and Science, remarking that she was the youngest person to whom it had ever been awarded. On the 11th February, she played at Cologne, in the Gürzenich concert. The Kölnische Volkszeitung, when speaking of her, says: "If dazzling technical skill, clever conception, and sharp characterization entitle any one to the name of an artist, the predicate must be unconditionally bestowed on this young lady, for she is in full possession of all the above qualities. Her brilliant reception by the public here was, therefore, just and merited." On the 14th February, Mdlle. Krebs played at a concert in Utrecht, and was enthusiastically applauded. She was greeted with a flourish from the orchestra and hearty cheers from the audience. After the concert, there was a serenade and torchlight procession in her honour. It was on her return from her tour that she was taken ill, and obliged not only not to play in the concert on Ash Wednesday, for which she was announced, but likewise to give up her own concert, which was fixed for the 3rd inst. She was unable, moreover, to accept an invitation to play at Düsseldorf on the 13th. In all probability, it will be some time before she is in a condition to resume her professional exertions, as the strictest repose has been enjoined by her medical advisers.—Dresden, March 12.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—At the ninth Evening for Chamber Music Mdme. Emmy Hallwachs-Heintz, pianist, from Berlin, appeared for the first time here. She played most successfully Weber's D minor Sonata, besides taking part in Beethoven's Trio in B flat major, Op. 97, the violin and violoncello parts being ably sustained by Herren Hermann and Müller. In addition to these pieces, the programme included R. Schumann's Stringed Quartet in A major, Op. 41.

ANTWERP.—The management of the Theatre contemplates bringing out Herr R. Wagner's Rienzi.

FLORENCE.—At a recent concert given by the Società Orfeo, in the Teatro Pagliano, the overture to Semiramide, and the march from Le Prophète were played by 48 hands on 12 pianos!

FERRARA.—Signor Macaferri, a tenor here, has just come in for a very good thing in the shape of a legacy of 100,000 francs from an uncle.

ATHENS.—The long-projected Conservatory of Music is at length an established fact. The institution was solemnly inaugurated lately in the presence of the King and Queen, the Ministers, and the entire Diplomatic Corps.

BRUNSWICK.—The Duke's civil list has just been increased by 30,000 thalers, on the understanding that part of the sum shall go to increase materially the salaries drawn by the members of the Ducal orchestra, and several members of the Ducal Theatre.

BRESLAU.—At the last concert of the Orchestral Union, Herr Stockhausen sang the bravura airs from Jean de Paris and Susanna, as well as songs by Schubert and Brahms. The principal instrumental work in the programme was Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

THE NEW MELBOURNE ORGAN.

During the month of August last, the great organ of the Melbourne Town Hall has been opened to the public. Not only is it supposed to be the finest instrument which has ever left Great Britain, but it is doubtful if it is not the largest. As a comparison, we may mention that the organ in Westminster Abbey has only 1524 pipes; that of St. Paul's, 1797; Exeter Hall, 2187; St. Sepulchre, whose bells used to toll the death-knell for the Old Bailey, 2500; and Birmingham, nearly 3,000. The organ of Christ Church, in Newgate Street, has 4,300 odd pipes, above 100 of which can be sounded by touching a single key, or, in other words, form a single note. The organ of York Minster also contains 4,300 odd pipes; the largest pipe (producing the lowest C of the scale) is 32 feet long, and of proportionate diameter; and a current of air to produce the sound must rush through such a space with the force of a tempest The Melbourne organ was built by Messrs. Hill and Son, its dimensions being—height, 46 feet; breadth, 52 feet, 6 inches; with a depth of 24 feet; the compass of each manual —CC to C—61 notes. The great organ has seventeen stops; the choir organ, ten; the swell organ, fourteen; and the solo organ, thirteen. The pedal organ has a compass of CCC to F—30 notes, and has twelve stops. The double open diapason and one of the open diapasons are of metal, and are respectively thirty-two and sixteen feet in height. The other open diapason is of wood, and is also sixteen feet high. It has nine couplers, namely—swell to great; swell to great (sub); swell to choir; choir to great (sub); solo to great: solo to pedal; choir to pedal; great to pedal; and swell to pedal. There are also four composition pedals to great, three ditto to swell, two to choir, and four combination stops (by hand) to solo organ. It also has a solo tremulant, making in all a total of 79 stops, and 4373 pipes. The pipes are made of hard-rolled zinc, the largest being 22 inches in diameter, the weight of each being 1,500 cwt. They are larger than any previously made for an organ. When in use the instrument has a supply of 480 cubic feet of wind, having four pressures of eleven, six, four, and three inches, and it is blown by three of Joy's hydraulic engines. The decorations are very elaborate, the pipes being illuminated, but left sufficiently unfinished to permit of them being made to accord with the general decoration of the hall. Our illustration represents the Grand Musical Festival under the management of Mr. Lyster, the greatest attempt in the way of concerts ever made in Melbourne. It was in every respect unexceptionable, so large an attendance never having previously congregated in the Town Hall. His Excellency the Governor and suite were present when the noble instrument was formally opened, and for the succeeding six or seven nights organ recitals were given for the benefit of the Melbourne charities. Of the organ itself the city of Melbourne may well be proud, taking rank as it does with some of the finest instruments in Great Britain.—Illustrated Australian News.

WATSON ON THE AMERICAN CRITICS.

After commenting upon the rarity of concerts in New York just now, Watson's Art Journal goes on to say with delightful candour:—

"The only consolation to be derived from this lugubrious state of affairs is, that the musical critics of the great dailies have had but little opportunity to air their jackasseries on the subject. This is a clear gain to the public, but it is rather hard upon the critics. Their occupation is pretty nearly gone, and visions of nothing to do, and the perquisites, stare them in the face, and suggest a return to first principles—namely, boot-making.

"It has been stated that Michael Angelo Cooneyo'vitch, of the New York Herald, during this awful lull, has been at work upon a learned treatise for publication, in which he proposes to prove the identity of the Ancient Irish Harp with the venerable Scotch Fiddle; and that it was really Brian Boriohme who put up those useful mile-posts, and not the Duke of Argyle, as has been erroneously asserted by some historians.

"Grim Gringle Wheeler is rather sorry that he discovered those arpeggi! He don't mind the Rubinstein arpeggio, because he believes that somebody found that out before; but the Wieniawski arpeggio has caused him a great deal of trouble; for instead of being able to enjoy a rest from his labours during this absence of music, his whole time is occupied in answering letters requesting explanations and even dingrams, of the Wieniawski arpeggio. He says if he had not known so much, he wouldn't have got into this trouble, but only knowing so much, why you know how it is yourself.

"Another eminent musical critic has commenced the study of the scales. He assured a friend that although he had been the musical critic of a daily paper for several years, he still found something to learn! The simple fellow does not know how much he has to learn before he knows anything."

MILAN.—It cannot be asserted that the management of the Scala has been at all niggardly this season in the article of tenors. It has already presented its patrons with Signori Campanini, Bulterini, Ugolini, Beufratelli, Brignoli, Genevois, and Leluni; yet it is now seeking another for Signor Perelli's new opera, Viola.

WAIFS.

HINTS FOR LADY SUPERIORS.—In the colleges each girl has a separate sleeping room, as we have a great objection to young girls sleeping together in one room, and inhaling each other's peculiar gas thrown off in the form of breath during their slumbers. Besides, when that practice prevailed, as it did formerly, the girls were in the habit of talking to each other upon subjects which often suggested inconvenient thoughts, even to the best disposed, and confirmed others in tendencies which eventually grew into confirmed vices. On the pupil's retiring to rest, the door of her sleeping-room is fastened from the outside by one of the matrons. The girl has no means of opening it herself, but by touching a little spring at the head of her couch she can, at any moment, communicate with the matron night-watchers. These matron night-watchers—two for a certain number of girls—are on the alert during the night, remaining in a place called the "watch," where are suspended the electric bells, underneath each of which is the name of the girl occupying the room to which it corresponds. Light is supplied to every dormitory by means of a lamp inserted in the wall, and opening from the outside. Half an hour after the door has been closed the matron extinguishes the light, without entering the room. The external red light of night is also excluded; for, as with you, darkness is thought much more conducive to refreshing sleep.—"Another World."

We are glad to hear that the subscription to the present Philharmonic season is one of the largest ever known.

The Bristol Musical Festival, which is fixed to take place late in October, will be conducted by Mr. Charles Hallé.

Herr Joachim, every amateur will be pleased to know, will remain in London until the end of the Monday Popular Concert season.

The death, on Thursday, of Signor Guglielmo, the composer of "The Lover and the Bird," and other popular songs, is announced.

Watson says: "Mr. Edmund Yates will be the correspondent of the Herald, at the Vienna Exposition. He will take his departure for Europe on the 12th of March, previous to which he will make a lecture tour through Canada."

The death of Madama Rosalie Thémar (Mrs. Robert E. Lonsdale), is announced. Madame Thémar was not only an accomplished pianist but a true artist, and her loss will be deeply regretted by a large circle of admiring friends.

M. Adrien Talexy's new operetta, Le Garcon de Cabinet, lately produced in Paris at the Theatre Des Folies Marigny, will be produced at the Princess's Theatre by the French company, immediately. It is already adapted to the English stage by Mr. Wellington Guernsey.

Signor Arditi, who is at Vienna conducting the "Adelina Patti" performances at the Italian opera, met with an enthusiastic reception on his entry into the orchestra. Our correspondent informs us that "Mr. Gye was present on the first night," but does not name the opera that was given.

The Paris Figaro, speaking of the Chevalier de Kontski, observes that some people are Poles because they are pianists, and others are pianists because they are Poles. Our contemporary goes on to compare the Chevalier to a half-pay troop major; but he then becomes personal, and we cannot follow him.

With coals at forty shillings a ton, some warmth of expression on the part of heads of families may be forgiven. Rumble Mayne (who never forgets his favourite Handel), when he replenishes the grate, contents himself with adapting the words of one of the principal characters in Acis and Galatea, saying, "I burn, I rage."—Punch.

The American tour of Madame Adelina Patti is postponed till the year 1875, the operatic officials of St. Petersburgh having succeeded in prolonging her stay in Russia for two more seasons. They have paid a large indemnity to Herr Maurice Strakosch, her brother-in-law, for cancelling the contract of the Transatlantic trip.

We learn from Edinburgh that Signor Aramburo, Mr. Mapleson's new tenor, whose inexplicable non-appearance at Glasgow created so much excitement, has at last "turned up" and made a triumphant début as Manrico, at the Theatre Royal, Edinburgh. He was to appear as Fernando, in La Favorita, on Thursday, and great expectations have been raised as to his performance of that rôle, which is said to be his best.

The Standard, in a notice of Mr. Mapleson's prospectus, observed:—

"The important and welcome announcement is also made that the posthumous opera known to have been left in an almost completed state by the late Mr. Balfe will be produced, Sir Michael Costa having, with kindly self-abnegation, undertaken the task of moulding into form and putting the last touch to the concluding portion of the work, left only in sketch by the lamented composer. This last effort of Balfe's genius, written fortunately, and to the enhancement of our expectations, when circumstances allowed him more leisure to devote all his faculties to the task, and to wait, if necessary, for the moment of inspiration, is entitled Il Talismanno, the subject of the libretto, which is written by Mr. A. Matthison, being drawn from Walter Scott's Talisman."

Three performances have been recently given on the Paris prize organ of Bryceson & Sons, in the tropical department at the Crystal Palace, by Mr. George Tolhurst, who played, on each occasion, a selection from his oratorio, Ruth. We understand that it is in contemplation to remove this instrument to a different place in the building, the spot it now occupies being required for other works of art.

A Scottish gentleman proposes that, on the occasion of the next "Gregorian Demonstration" at St. Paul's, an instrument more appropriate to that performance shall be substituted for the "kist fu' o' whistles." Instead of the organ, he suggests—let the accompaniments of the Gregorian music, if any, be played on the bagpipes. That, he urges, the king of instruments, is, in reality as in name, the right one whereon to accompany the Gregorian tones. He adds that, though his foot just now is awa' from his native heath, his name is MacGregor.—Punch.

There will be a service at St. Paul's, including Bach's Passion music (St. Matthew), on Tuesday in Holy Week, at seven p.m. Seats in the choir will be reserved for members of the cathedral and a limited number of their friends. A certain number of seats in the dome area and in the transepts will be appropriated for the Lord Mayor and the City authorities, the committee for the decoration of St. Paul's, and those who take part in the performance of the music. The rest of the dome, with the nave, will be open to the public, who will be admitted by the Western doors. Admission to the reserved places will be by ticket.

The Tribune of Chicago says:—

"Lucca, Nilsson, Adelina Patti, Carlotta Patti, Parepa, Kellogg, Grau, Strakosch and Maretzek, have all anchored a deposit in Chicago real estate against foul weather. There is nothing like it. It is an investment which pays. It can never be disturbed by Prussian edicts or Mallinger cabals. When the year 1900 has turned round the corner, all the artist-owners of real estate are coming here to reside on their property, and compare notes on the seasons at Crosby's and McVicker's and help on the prima donnas of the day, who are now in swaddling clothes, with no more suggestions of music about them than arise from the prick of a pin or empty stomachs."

We quote the following from a French journal of New Orleans, in noticing the Rubinstein Concert, February 8th:—

"Mdlle. Liebhart est une artiste de mérite; seulement tout en elle est anglais; elle est blanche et rose, ses cheveux sont blonds comme ceux des poupées, sa mise, sa tenue, ses gestes sont anglais, sa voix elle même est blonde. Aussi se plait-elle dans un genre de chant qui convient aux ballads et lieder; et les tenues, les points d'orgue sont parfaits chez elle. La voix de ce soprano est bien travaillée, bien exercée, avec la souplesse nécessaire pour le trille et la cadence. Prise telle qu'elle est, dans sa spécialité tendre et blonde, Mdlle. L. Liebhart a beaucoup de succès."

In the Cathedral of Girgenti, in Sicily, the slightest whisper is borne with perfect distinctness from the great western door to the cornice behind the high altar, a distance of 250 feet. By a most unlucky coincidence, the precise focus of divergence at the former station was chosen for the confessional. Secrets never intended for the public ear thus became known, to the dismay of the confessors, and the scandal of the people, by the resort of the curious to the opposite point (which seems to have been discovered accidentally), till at length, one listener, having had his curiosity somewhat over-gratified by hearing his wife's avowal of her own infidelity, this tell-tale peculiarity became generally known, and the confessional was removed.

The Kunkel brothers, two music teachers of St. Louis, lately invited Rubinstein to a private entertainment at the Conservatory of Music, and, without forewarning him, played his Fantasia, Op. 73, for two pianos, in a style that elicited from him many exclamations of admiration as well as surprise. When the performance was ended, Rubinstein said to the pianists: "Gentlemen, I must make you the compliment to say that this is the best two-piano playing I have ever listened to, and it is the first time I have ever heard my own composition performed, except when I myself assisted. You have given me a new and delightful pleasure, too, for I now can see myself as a composer as well as a performer." At his request the Messrs. Kunkel repeated their performance, and he advised them to go to Europe, and give concerts.

PARMA.—A new opera, Marcellina, the first effort of a young composer named Telesforo Righi, has been produced, but with only moderate success, at the ex-Royal Theatre.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine, (Longman & Co.,) they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from, Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

PREFACE.

No country possesses more good voices than England, and many voices would be a fortune to their owners if they knew how to use them.

Vocal Exercises, however, are much neglected, owing, in a great measure, to their monotony of passage and of style.

The object of these Studies is to make practice as attractive as possible, and the Waltz form has therefore been chosen for its liveliness.

A selection has been made of passages best suited to give flexibility to the voice, and the six Waltzes here presented contain the germs of a thorough method of vocal practice.

The Italian language is preferred on account of the openness of the vowels; but these studies can be used advantageously without words, by simply "vocalising" on the vowel A (pronounced in Italian, Ah.)

Commas (,) are placed where breath is to be taken. At first, however, pupils should practise each study very slowly, and draw breath whenever found necessary.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION.

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country. The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. VAN PRAAG.

MR. VAN PRAAG, who has been for many years past well known to the members of the Musical Profession, and the public, as holding a responsible position at the principal Concert-rooms of the West End, is now, in his 74th year. In addition to his failing health and strength, he has also recently become a widower, and is, by this sad bereavement, left alone, with not a relative in England to aid or take care of him. He has children in California who wish him to go out to them, and it is his own desire, notwithstanding his age and infirmities, to do so. Want of means for undertaking so long and expensive a journey, which his children are unable to supply, however, preclude the possibility of his leaving England. Under these circumstances, a few friends, well able to bear witness to his respectability, honesty, and courtesy in the discharge of the duties he has so "well and worthily fulfilled," are anxious to raise a Subscription in his behalf, to which contributions are earnestly and respectfully requested.

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May!
What joys attend thine advent gay!
On every tree the birdies sing,
From hill and dale glad echoes ring;
The lark, inspir'd, to Heav'n ascends,
The gurgling brook in beauty wends
By mossy bank and grassy brae,
Where violets bloom and lambkins play.
Delightful Spring—sweet month of May
What joys attend thine advent gay!

THE "EPIDEMIA WAGNERIANA" IN BERLIN.

The Royal—or, to speak more correctly, the Joachimian—High School, on the one hand, with the Sing-Akademie, Stern's Gesangverein, and the Cathedral Choir, on the other, may be regarded as the poles between which the musical life of Berlin revolves. On the intermediate ground whole hosts of Associations, Musical Educational Establishments, Concert Institutes, and independent virtuosos, disport themselves, giving the musical doings generally a motley manifoldness and multiformity, but scarcely marking them with any special stamp, despite a high degree of merit, which cannot be disputed, in isolated instances. A material feature—even though only a grimace—would be wanting in the description of this whizzing and whirring wheel-work, were no allusion made to the efforts of the adepts who follow Richard Wagner here. In these we stumble upon a curiously mixed society, the most prominent and most indubitable element in which is its thoroughly dilettante character; indeed, it is this superficial dilettantee-ism, deficient in everything like the power of taking a view of art as a whole, which forms the weakest point in the wide-spread Epidemia Wagneriana. The larger and better part of the artistic world here holds itself aloof from this Wagner Association. Wagner, indeed, would have every cause to beg Heaven to preserve him from his friends, were he not himself the chief performer, who gives the tone in the repulsive concert executed by his adherents. The man and the writer in Wagner render it extremely difficult for an impartial person to appreciate with perfect objectiveness the artistic side of his nature. Thus he had only not to write his book on conducting, and represent himself in it as the sole true Messiah for practical German art, and he would have found his really eminent talent as a conductor more generally and more ungrudgingly acknowledged. That he does possess such talent he showed at the Wagner concerts of the year 1871, and of the fourth February, by which he absolutely electrified the young artistic world, and gained, also, the complete approbation of those older and more experienced artists, who were by no means so dazzled by the phenomenon as not to be conscious of its proximate and natural causes. An extremely energetic individual like Wagner, filled with an enthusiastic devotion to Beethoven, and surrounded by the nimbus of deep artistic respect, besides being vigorously supported by influential patrons, could not fail to excite to quite unusual efforts associations of musicians whose regular performances, repeated day after day in wearisome uniformity, and generally under a very easy-going system of conducting, move along on the level of somewhat indolent routine. Similar wonders, with a no less electrical result, were effected by Mendelssohn and others, who did not, however, on that account, consider themselves the Elect of the Lord, and vomit forth poison and gall upon their predecessors and contemporaries. Wagner cannot, most decidedly, complain of being neglected in Berlin. His popular operas, Rienzi, Der fliegende Holländer, Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, and Die Meistersinger are frequently performed here, about as well as existing resources permit, and, if the intended production of Tristan und Isolde did not come off, Wagner himself was to blame, because he insisted upon taking an active part in it, and even named his friend Bülow as the only person capable of directing the instrumental part. But his worshippers here still entertain highflown plans, and would be glad to see the master appointed Meyerbeer's successor, and crowned Musical Director General, or musical Emperor of Germany. The nomination, some years ago, of a conductor of the Wagnerian School to the Royal orchestra, an act brought about during the summer visit of certain high personages to Baden, was the thin edge of the wedge driven into matters here. In the year 1871, however, the breach was considered wide enough for the author of the German "Kaisermarsch" to be pushed in after it, when the springing of a counter-mine at the last moment—on the very day of the Wagner Concert—frustrated the plan. This was immediately bruited about, though only in a vague manner, when the Wagner banquet, solemnly announced before, was suddenly put off after the said concert, and the master departed without sound of drum. But, on this occasion, it was not so much artistic reasons, as military and political reminiscences which nonplussed Wagner. Intrigues are now being woven with the greater hope of ultimate success, as there is no scarcity of influential personages, who, for want of sufficient occupation in their own proper sphere of action, indulge in Wagnerian enthusiasm, when there is an opportunity, as, for instance, at the first representation of Die Meistersinger, who provide and instruct the claque, and who thus gain an admirable method for passing their time and having the pleasure of covering their names with the reputation of Macenases, or even of sometimes seeing them in print. True, everything in musical and artistic matters here is not as it ought to be, especially in opera, but to prescribe Wagner as a remedy would be too radical a style of cure. I have seen many sterling artists, who combine a thorough knowledge of his personal character with unconditional admiration of him as a composer, start with terror at the idea of seeing him placed at the head of musical matters among us. This thorough egotist, who does not, even for a single instant, hesitate identifying his blessed self with the whole Future of German music, is more exclusive and autocratic than words can describe, and the fanaticism of his followers exceeds that of the Jews at their worst times. I know people here who will no longer play a note that is not written by Wagner, and who would gladly pronounce sentence of social proscription against all who do not, like themselves, swear in verba magistri. Whenever I think of Wagner in such a position, I unconsciously behold in my mind, as an ideal picture forming a contrast to a distorted caricature, what Schinkel has done in his capacity of General Director of Public Buildings. What a difference between Schinkel's inegotistical, harmonious, artistic nature, and the morbidly excited temperament of Wagner, who fancies the world is simply a mirror, which reflects, from a thousand facets, the form of his own Self as he gazes on it.—Kölnische Zeitung.

THE LATE SIR HENRY BISHOP.

(To the Editor of the "Daily Courier.")

SIR,—Having seen in your paper of to-day a paragraph headed "A daughter of Sir Henry Bishop destitute," may I beg to contradict the statement. There are only two surviving daughters—myself and elder sister. We are both married, and are holding good positions in life; therefore I think it nothing but justice to assert that the subscription which Sir Robert Carden has opened in London for "a daughter of the late Sir Henry Bishop" does not refer to either of us. Trusting you will give publicity to this, I am, sir, &c.,

A DAUGHTER OF THE LATE SIR HENRY BISHOP.

["The writing of this letter was somewhat unnecessary, because, the lady who applied to Sir Robert Carden did not say that she was a daughter, but a daughter-in-law of Sir H. Bishop.]

TO MISS KITTY GLASS.

Oh, Kittie, with the golden hair—
Nay, nay if it were then more fair,
'Twould then be golden-by, as luck
Scarce cared to finish such a duck.
I'll straight begin again to say,
That if, then, by your leave I may—
O, Kittie with the dark-brown hair,
So cute, so knowing, yet so fair,
So prompt to mischief and to face,
So ready with fond Cupid's grace—
For in the present time' tis tow,
To talk of arrow or of bow—
Flirt not so much with all you meet,
Nor be to all so very sweet.
Restrain your haughty love of noise,
And do not box the ears of boys,
Be pretty still, and often smile,
And think to what I say awhile:—
Old maidenhood is close at hand,
And always "missing" is not grand,
So let this poor attempt at fun,
Be laughed at, and received from one,
Both hoping you'll not always "miss"
And begging payment in a "kiss."

A HISTORY OF THE TORCH-DANCE.*

During the whole period of antiquity, the solemn use of torches in social and religious concerns had a varied and deep significance. Thus, at one of the most important events of human life, an event marking the foundation of a well-ordered civil state, at the ceremony of marriage, the torch was indispensable. We know that, among the old Hellenes, all public festivals owed some of their splendour to torch-light processions, as, for instance, the grand festival of the Eleusinian Mysteries, in honour of Demeter, the worthy Mother Earth, and inventress of agriculture. At the festivals of Dionysius, the employment of torches was especially frequent, both at the night festivals in Attica, and at the festival which, according to Pausanias, used to be celebrated every year under the name of lampteria (the feast of lights), at Pellene in Achaia; likewise at the notorious Bacchanalia in Rome, which, as we know, were subsequently suppressed by a resolution of the Senate. At the Roman Bacchanalia, as Livy informs us, the women, dressed like raging Mænads, ran down to the Tiber, and, dipping the torches they carried into the stream, drew them out again still alight, as they were smeared with sulphur and lime. Especially remarkable, too, were the torch-races, on foot and horseback, celebrated in Athens at five annual festivals in honour of the gods, who were regarded as the creators and preservers of fire and light, the most important elements for art and trade; these five festivals were the festival of Hephaistos, the blacksmith of the gods; the festival of Prometheus, the bestower of divine light, a festival celebrated in the Academy of the town; the Panathenaise, in honour of the divine patroness of Athens; the festival of Artemis, worshipped under the name of Bendis as goddess of the moon; and the festival of Pan, the rustic god of the plains. In all these torch-races, Pausanias tells us, the aim of the competitors, while running at full speed towards the goal, was to prevent their wax, taperlike torches, fixed in a holder with a screen, from going out. The primary object of these races may, perhaps, have been to celebrate the memory of the benefits springing from the gift of fire to man; at other festivals, however, as at the festival of Dionysius, there was added the higher notion of purification by fire from all moral and sensual uncleanliness; while, generally, people were fond of comparing the burning and the extinguishing of the lighted torch with the beginning and end of man, and with the happy and unhappy events of his life. In the old religions, fire and light were regarded as the visible signs of the highest purity and sanctity, and in the worship of light by the old Asiatic Parsees, of which some portion still exists, fire was honoured even as the symbol of the all-wise and all-maintaining God himself.

Both the significance thus attached by the Greeks to the blazing emblem of fire, as well as the fact that the Hellenic bride was taken home to her husband's house at night, gave rise to the old custom of conducting her to the bridegroom by the bright light of torches borne by slaves. This custom is mentioned by Homer and Hesiod. Among the beautiful metal pictures in relief, with which the artistic Hephaistos decorated the shield of Achilles, Homer mentions one (II., xviii, etc.) in these terms: "On it, also, he represented two towns. . . . . One was full of marriage ceremonies and songs. Young brides brought out of their apartments by the light of torches proceeded through the town, and clear resounded the bride-song. Dancing youths turned round nimbly; but the women stood, wrapt in wonder, before the houses, gazing at each bride."

The custom was perpetuated among the Romans by one of the relatives of the bride, dancing, torch in hand, before the latter as she was conducted to her new home, at night, by the two bridesmen. Hymenæus, the old Hellenic patron god of marriage, was, therefore, always represented with the blazing torch of life, as an essential attribute and symbol of his divine nature.

That among certain of the primitive German races torches were employed to add to the splendour of the marriage festivities is something which we can neither affirm nor deny with certainty; but that torches, as well as lights and bonfires, were employed by them with a religious significance is a fact known to us from many sources, as well as evident from edicts forbidding torches or lights to be lighted in honour of the old Pagan divinities. These edicts were promulgated at many meetings of the Church during the fifth and sixth centuries, and renewed in an ordinance issued by Charlemagne, in the year 789, at Aix-la-Chapelle.

Betweeen the religious significance we have now mentioned as attributed by the ancients to torches and lights, a significance not quite foreign to Christianity, and the torch-dance at the courts of German Princes in later times, the connecting link is an exceedingly slight one, consisting, perhaps, only in the circumstance that, as in the case of the nocturnal festivals of the gods, so, also, for court festivities, there was no better method for enhancing the pomp of a grand procession, when the brilliant light of torches, like a lighted torch generally, was regarded as a necessary adjunct of every especially important ceremony, though it cannot be denied that subsequently, when the torch-dance was customary only at the celebration of marriages, people connected with it the old symbolical idea which gave rise to the practice among the nations of classical antiquity of accompanying the bride with torches.—At the Imperial Byzantine Court, also, according to the tradition of the Ceremonial of Constantinos Porphyrogennetos, as it is called, torch-dances were usual; they were got up on the night before the anniversary of the new Imperial city of Constantinople, by the two circus parties, the green and the blue, then existing there. The dancers entered the hippodrome in the evening, and, while they went through their evolutions, a song was sung by vocalists in praise of the Emperor. The inhabitants of Byzantium gave the dance the corrupt Latin name of Faklarea. But it is evident that the dance possessed originally a religious significance, as a relic suggestive of the solemnities practised in the times of Paganism. We shall not attempt to decide whether the Byzantine ceremony was the model of the modern torch-dance, with which it appears to have had but little resemblance. Several persons have asserted that it is, an assertion not to be hastily rejected, if we bear in mind the care with which the ceremonial code of Byzantium was followed in other points by the nations of the West.

One thing, however, seems certain, namely, that the more modern torch-dance was first introduced as a dance of honour at the balls, with which, in the days of chivalry, the tournaments concluded, and that the torches employed were devoid of all religious, and even of all symbolical, significance, being partly necessary, perhaps, for lighting up the place, and partly for giving more splendour to the proceedings. According to the usages at tournaments, as collected by the well-known King Renatus of Sicily, in the 15th century, the act of presenting the prizes, or "thanks" as they were termed in the days of chivalry, to the victors ought to take place on the evening of the tournament, when the lady who officiated, accompanied by her two maids of honour, and preceded by a large number of persons carrying torches, ought to be conducted, through the ranks of the umpires and knights, out of the hall, and then, after fetching the prize, or "Dank," be conducted back again; the victor had the right to a dance of honour with the lady from whose hands he had received the prize. The same rules are laid down in the work published in Paris with the date of 1638: "Le vrai théâtre d'honneur et de la chevalrie par M. de Vulson, Sieur de la Colombière." According to the practice at tournaments in Germany, the dance of honour commenced by the light of torches, held by gentlemen of good birth, and equal in rank and dignity to the couple of dancers. Even in Rüxner's Book of Tournaments, and other old German books of a similar kind, some of the torch-bearers are always represented as advancing, two-and-two, before the couple who are dancing the dance of honour, while others are drawn up at the sides of the hall; the authors of the books, moreover, consider the torches as so essential an element of the dance, that they do not even mention them in their description of it. There is no doubt that the ordinary opening dance of honour executed by the victors and the ladies of honour, after the prizes had been presented, as several times mentioned in the description of the tournament got up in 1509, at Ruppin, by Joachim I., Elector of Brandenburg, was performed by the light of torches, though in this description again they are not specially mentioned. They are mentioned, however, in the description of subsequent tournaments, as, for instance, in that edited by Wackhalni in 1618, at Tübingen; of the tournament held at the marriage of Prince Ludwig Friedrich of Würtemberg with the Princess Magdalena

Elisabeth of Hesse, and the baptism, at the same time, of Prince Johann Friedrich of Würtemberg, in the year 1617, at Stuttgart, when it is expressly stated that: "in accordance with the old custom of Teutonic chivalry, after the trumpets had been sounded, the first combatant, namely, the magnanimous and victorious hero, Fidamor (Johann Friedrich, the reigning Duke of Würtemberg), having been summoned a first, a second, and a third time, was, on his appearance, allowed a dance of honour, when, in his honour, princes, counts, and lords, danced before and after him," and in the same way there were at this tournament dances of honour for the other victors with their ladies of honour.

From these accounts, it is incontrovertibly manifest that the torch-dance is nothing more nor less than a simple knightly ceremonial, handed down from the usages at tournaments, and retained for the nuptials of princely personages, when the other customs were given up at the extinction of chivalry. Just as formerly, the bride, in her character of lady of honour, opened the dance with the victor in the tournament, she danced in the more modern torch-dance with some, or all the princes present, the natural result being that the princely bridegroom had to dance with the princesses; for, at most courts, this mark of honour was granted only to persons of princely rank. In the old dance of honour at tournaments, the torches were borne by princes, counts, and gentlemen of birth; in the more modern dance, this service of honour devolved on the superior officials, such as generals, ministers of state, and chamberlains.—As far as our accounts enable us to investigate the subject, we find, in recent times, the torch-dance at the Courts of Copenhagen (whither, no doubt, it was carried by the house of Oldenburg), of Berlin, and of Hanover, had its own especial peculiarities at each Court. At the Court of Copenhagen, in the torch-dances in honour of the marriage of the heir-apparent with Magdalena Sibylla, Electoral Princess of Saxony, in 1634, and at the marriage of the Electoral Prince Karl von der Pfalz, the members of the nobility preceded and followed the couple of dancers two-by-two; in the account written at the time (by Lünig) of the first of these solemnities, it is stated that the ambassadors of Austria, France, and Poland, at the Danish Court, took part in the torch-dance, but the author remarks that, according to German custom, this was an honour belonging only to personages of princely rank.

At Hanover, on the occasion of the marriage of the Princess Sophia Dorothea, of Hanover with Friedrich Wilhelm I., Elector of Prussia, in 1706, after supper on the day of the wedding, three dances of honour (as we learn from Günther) were danced by the royal bride, namely, one with the Electoral Prince of Hanover, as plenipotentiary of the bridegroom; one with the Elector of Hanover, her father; and one with Prince Ernest Augustus, her brother, twelve white wax torches being borne at each dance, before the dancers, by ministers, generals, and chamberlains. At the court of Berlin (according to Fassmann's account), the torches, during the reigns of the first two kings, were borne in the dances of honour by Lieutenant-Generals, and the custom is expressly stated to be an old one; afterwards, and down to the present day, they were carried by ministers of state. The practice of all the Courts was the same in one point: as formerly in the case of the dance of honour danced by the victors at the tournaments, so the torch-dance was always executed amid the loud braying of trumpets and roll of kettle-drums.* In no country, except Germany, as far as we know, was the torch-dance retained at any court, after the discontinuance of tournaments.

From the following passage in the Denkwürdigkeiten of the Margravin of Bayreuth, we learn that, at the Court of Prussia, even under the reign of Friedrich Wilhelm I., one part of the ceremony, as far as the dance itself is concerned, was the still existing custom thus described: "The Marshals of the Court (Lord High Chamberlains), with their staves, open the procession; they are followed by all the Lieutenant-Generals of the army, carrying lighted wax torches. The newly-married couple walk twice round with measured steps; the bride then dances with all the Princes, one after the other, and, when she has finished her task, the bridegroom, taking her place, dances with all the Princesses one after the other."—The torch-dances written by Spontini for the festivities at the Court of Friedrich Wilhelm III., and the four written by Meyerbeer for the festivities of Friedrich Wilhelm IV., while highly characteristic specimens of their class, are something much more than mere occasional pieces, and possess real artistic value. Further admirable specimens of the kind are the torch-dances of Count Redern, and of Duke Ernest, of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha.

*In consequence of this, the music for the torch-dances, customary at marriage festivities of the Prussian Court, is still written for brass instruments and kettle-drums, and executed by those instruments exclusively, in the White Hall of the Palace.—Editor of "Echo."

M. GOUNOD'S CONCERTS.

The interest of these concerts is in a large measure sustained by the production of works fresh from the pen of M. Gounod. On Saturday evening, for example, five pieces were given for the first time, and four for the second time; in addition to which a quartet for piano, concertina, viola, and violoncello, by Mr. Silas, achieved its initial success. Novelty so profuse could not fail to attract, and the audience drawn together by it was numerous as well as enthusiastic. In the first absolutely new work of the evening M. Gounod exhibited another of his curious experiments with choral effects, the result being, to our taste, more curious than beautiful. His setting of a little poem, "The Bell," is for two choirs, whereof one choir hums weird harmonies to the "boom" of the pianoforte, while the other sings the verses. But if M. Gounod failed with this piece, he achieved more than corresponding success with good, honest, and genuine music. A setting of "Go, lovely rose, tell her that wastes her time and me," pleased all who heard it; the last verse, "Then die, that she the common fate of all things rare may read in thee," being made particularly effective by writing of the highest excellence. A tenor song, "When in the early morn," was even more successful, and had to be repeated. It is distinguished by great expressiveness throughout; but the peroration, like Marguerite's music in the Faust finale, is of a sustained intensity peculiar to the composer, and one of his happiest tours de force. We must give at least equal praise to a baritone scena, Abraham's Request, capitally sung by Signor Gustave Garcia, and encored. The "request" forming the subject of the piece is that made by Abraham to the men of Heth for a place in which to bury his dead, and the eloquent words ascribed to the patriarch are treated in M. Gounod's very best manner. From the quiet opening recitative, "And Abraham stood up before his dead," to the closing thought of One whose coming will bring eternal life, the music so gathers passion and power that the least susceptible cannot but be moved at hearing it. In this case, also, the final verse is the most impressive. The chromatic descending passage upon the words which relate how Abraham would keep his dead within his sight forms a splendid contrast to the swelling phrases suggested by the idea of immortality. Nothing could be better. A soprano solo, "My beloved spake," which has the advantage of a violoncello obbligato, in addition to the pianoforte accompaniments, is hardly so striking as its companion works; but in it, also, there are passages of much beauty. We would cite, as a conspicuous example, the music to the words, "Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away"—music which, for tenderness and charm of effect, could hardly be surpassed.

The foregoing remarks by no means exhaust the interest connected with M. Gounod's new works; but some attention is due to the performance, and especially to the singing of the choir. We regret to observe that the number of voices under M. Gounod's command remains inadequate, and that in point of tone quality there is still room for improvement, but as regards balance of parts, precision and observance of nuances, present results are very satisfactory. In fact, it would be hard to find reasonable fault with the way in which some of the pieces were given on Saturday evening. Arcadelt's Ave Maria, and "Go, lovely rose," were among these unquestionable successes. The La Jeune family's performance of the overture to Guillaume Tell, on three instruments of the "free reed" class, was clever, though by no means worthy to be associated with that of Mr. Silas's quartet, the concertina notwithstanding. This work is one of so much ability that we cannot but wish its composer had written for a more classical group of instruments. We may specially commend the finale, in which a chorale does duty as a second subject. Few movements outside the class of accepted masterpieces are more skilfully constructed or developed in a more musicianly and effective manner. The quartet was well played by its composer (piano), Mr. Blagrove (concertina), Mr. Wiener (viola), and M. Paque (violoncello). M. Gounod conducted the choral music, and accompanied the songs in his own masterly way.

NAPLES.—Signor Petrella's opera, I promessi Sposi, will be represented after Signor Verdi's Aïda at the San Carlo. The last opera produced during the present season will be Signor Pacini's Maria Tudor.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

A short reference to Saturday's concert is called for, if only on account of Mr. Franklin Taylor's dexterous and spirited performance of Beethoven's fourth pianoforte concerto. To play the "concerto in G" as it should be played is, perhaps, a more delicate and even arduous task than to play its magnificent successor in E flat—fifth and last work of the kind composed by Beethoven for an instrument the repertory of which he enriched with so many treasures. Mr. Franklin Taylor has shown his ability to do justice to both. His execution of the No. 4, on Saturday—of the first movement especially—was uniformly good, in many respects, indeed, admirable. A light, elastic touch, a musical tone, evenly balanced scale playing, and a fluency indispensable to a work which depends so much for adequate delivery on perfect freedom of wrist and fingers, were apparent throughout; and to these qualities may be added a legitimate reading, marked by phrasing and expression always natural, never exaggerated, never at variance with the intention of the composer. Mr. Taylor was rewarded, at the termination of his performance, with loud applause from all parts of the concert-room, and also with a "recall" to the platform, when the applause was renewed.

There was an interesting novelty at this concert, in the shape of a so-called "dramatic fantasia," for orchestra, by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, of Cologne, divided into five movements, and some of these movements so subdivided as to make in all twelve brief fragments. The first of the five principal subdivisions is entitled, "Tragedy"; the second, "Comedy"; the third, "Modern Drama"; and the fourth, "Ballet"; the fifth (Finale), which bears no title, recurring to some of the most notable themes heard previously. The idea is not only excellent, but carried out with great fancy, ingenuity, and skill. The performance, however—rare complaint to urge against the Crystal Palace orchestra—was hardly up to the mark; which, if it be true, as we understand, that there had been no more than one rehearsal, may be fairly explained on that account. Dr. Hiller should be allowed by Mr. Manns another opportunity of being judged.

The overture at this concert was Cherubini's Lodoiska, the second opera composed for Paris by the uncompromising Florentine master, and produced at the Feydeau in 1791, during the most stormy period of the French Revolution. This overture must not be confounded with the orchestral prelude to another Lodoiska, written in the same year, and presented at the Favart, almost about the same time—the composition of Rodolphe Kreutzer, to whom Beethoven inscribed his most famous sonata for pianoforte and violin, and whom, by the way, the intelligent and communicative "G" much under-estimates in saying that, but for the fact just cited, "his very name would have been utterly forgotten." Besides composing, either alone or in co-operation with musicians of celebrity, like Méhul, Berton, Spontini, Persuis, Boieldieu, &c., more than thirty operas, Kreutzer produced a vast quantity of instrumental music—including some 20 violin concertos, which, with his studies for the violin, have very considerably helped the progress of that instrument, not only as a means of display but in other respects. In short, he was one of the greatest of violinists, as well as one of the most fertile of violin composers; and many of his works, even to this day, exercise a legitimate influence on students. Kreutzer was certainly not equal as a composer to Viotti; but he was at least equal to Rode, and others whose names are still more or less familiar. Of course, the overture to Cherubini's Lodoiska is a far higher-class production than that to his contemporary's opera of the same name, once so universally admired, and—like Kotzwara's Battle of Prague, Ignace Pleyel's Concertante, Nicolai's Sonata in C, Boieldieu's overture to the Caliph of Bagdad, &c.—played by young and old on almost every pianoforte. Nevertheless, the other had also its merits, though of a lower order. Cherubini's overture (too rarely heard, by the way, like many other things of the kind,) was very finely rendered, as was the symphony of the day—Beethoven's "No. 8" (in F), the performance of which was alone worth a visit to Sydenham. The well known allegretto, once a stock piece at the concerts of the late M. Jullien, who strove so energetically to make his audience appreciate genuine music by degrees, was encored and repeated. The entire symphony was a treat; and seldom has the somewhat complex and difficult finale been better executed—with more vigour, and, at the same time, with more scrupulous attention to light and shade—even by the Crystal Palace orchestra, under the direction of its experienced conductor, Mr. Manns.

The vocal music was intrusted to Mdme. Otto Alvsleben and Signor Topai. The gentleman, who formed one of the company at the recent performances of Italian Opera in St. George's Hall, sang "Non piu andrai," and an air from one of the many forgotten operas of Pacini. The lady who, in the summer of 1871, was a chief "star" at the memorable Beethoven Centenary Festival in Bonn, gave an air from Mozart's Zauberflöte and the grand scene of Agatha from Der Freischütz—both with fine declamation, remarkable power of voice and strong feeling. Each of Mdme. Alvsleben's performances drew forth hearty, prolonged, and well-merited applause.

For the next concert we are promised a new Mass, in F, by Mr. Crowther Alwyn (student at the Royal Academy of Music); the second pianoforte concerto of Mendelssohn—to be played by Signor Alfonso Rendano; and among other things, the overtures to St. Paul (Mendelssohn), and Genovera (Schumann).

ST. ANNE'S CHURCH, SOHO.

The special Lenten services held at this church can hardly fail to possess great and deep interest. Every Friday evening during Lent John Sebastian Bach's Passion Music, according to the Gospel of St. John, takes the place of "Anthem"—a sermon dividing the first part of the oratorio from the second. The order of service comprises the shortened Evening Prayer, with Psalms and one Lesson; the Anthem (Bach), with sermon, as already mentioned; the Offertory, with appropriate Hymn, &c. The chorus, men and boys, from fifty to sixty in number, is highly efficient, and well supported by an orchestra of fifteen practised performers (including Herr Oberthür, as harpist). A large part of the choir consists of persons who habitually sing at St. Anne's, trained to their task by Mr. Joseph Barnby, organist of the church, to whom we are more indebted than to anyone else for the sympathy now so rapidly growing in favour of music which the immortal Leipsic Cantor strictly intended for Church worship. St. John's Passion being less difficult than St. Matthew's, is better suited to ordinary means and appliances; and its colossal companion might with propriety be kept apart for grand occasions, to be celebrated in grand edifices. The special psalm, on both occasions, was by Mr. Hine ("My God, my God, look upon me"), and the "Nunc dimittis" ("Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace"), which was to a setting by the Rev. C. A. Wickes. The "Offertory Hymn," "Jesu, my Lord, my God, my all," was to a tune by Mr. Barnby himself (from the Hymnary), the complete appropriateness of which is best proved by the almost unanimously hearty way in which the congregation take up the upper voice part—some even, with perhaps hardly equal success, joining in the middle parts and bass. It is only just to add that the solos for tenor, baritone, and bass in Bach's Passion are entrusted to three gentlemen amateurs, more or less intimately connected with St. Anne's; and that those (the tenor solos especially) are earnestly and well delivered. The air, "It is finished," with accompaniment of viol di gamba, is entrusted to one of the boys of the choir. Mr. Joseph Barnby conducts the Bach music from the chancel; and Mr. Hoyte, one of our most skilful organists, presides at the "king of instruments," delighting the congregation as they slowly make their exodus, with a voluntary by J. S. Bach, or some other great master. On Friday Mr. Hoyte gave Bach's superb prelude and fugue in G minor. The sermon on this occasion was preached by the Dean of Manchester, who selected for text—"My God, why hast thou forsaken me."

MDLLE. BUNSEN'S CONCERT.

This entertainment was given on Thursday, March 20, by kind permission of Major Wallace Carpenter, at 28, Ashley Place, Victoria Street; and was attended by a large and very fashionable audience, including His Excellency the Ambassador of Sweden. Mdlle. Bunsen enjoyed the co-operation of excellent artists on the occasion; but, as a matter of course, the performance of the fair concert-giver and her sister, Mdlle. Felicia Bunsen, created the greatest amount of interest. Mdlle. Victoria Bunsen made a good impression at the outset by her facile execution of Rossini's "Non più mesta;" following this up by taking part with Mr. Santley in a duet from La Favorita. She also sang Rossini's "Di tanti palpiti" in the style of an accomplished artist, but her most unequivocal success was gained in Barri's new song, "Mizpah." The composition itself is a good one, and all its charm was brought out by the talented executant, who had to repeat her effort in compliance with an enthusiastic demand. We hope to hear more of Mdlle. Victoria Bunsen. She is an artist whom to hear is to admire. Miss Felicia Bunsen, who made her first appearance, played a Romance and Polka brillante, by Berens, in a style which promises good things for the future. In addition to Mr. Santley, Miss Wynne, Signor Danieli, and Signor Rocca assisted at the concert.

BACH IN BIRMINGHAM.

(From the "Birmingham Morning News," March 22.)

Last night Mr. Stephen S. Stratton gave a concert at Messrs. Adams and Beresford's Music Room, in commemoration of the 188th birthday of the celebrated composer, John Sebastian Bach. The artists employed in rendering the selections were:—Violins, Herr Ludwig and Herr Carl Jung; viola, Mr. W. H. Priestley; violoncello, M. Vieuxtemps; double-bass, Mr. J. Moreton; flute, Mr. Sturges; pianoforte, Dr. C. S. Heap, Mr. Arthur Tricket and Mr. S. S. Stratton.

The programme, as the occasion demanded, consisted entirely of works of Sebastian Bach, and was made up chiefly of compositions by that great master for the chamber, and but rarely heard in this country. The following is an outline:—

Concerto in D minor, for three pianofortes, with accompaniment of string quintet.
Suite in E major, for violin alone.
Prelude and Fugue in E major } From the "Well-tempered Clavier."
Prelude and Fugue in C sharp major }
Concerto in D major, for pianoforte, flute, and violin, with accompaniment of string quartet.
Sonata in B minor, for pianoforte and violin.
Suite in D major for violoncello.
Toccato and Fugue in G minor for pianoforte.
Concerto in C major for three pianofortes, with accompaniments of string quintet.

The programme presented one feature, specially commendable; and we give the commendation more heartily because few concert-givers have the good taste and courage to behave so conscientiously in making their arrangements. Pieces which could not be given in their integrity were not admitted. Nothing was introduced simply for the display of the virtuoso. The items were, with one exception, examples of Bach's music as he wrote it.

The most important of the pieces were the two triple concertos, both of them colossal works, broad and grand in outline, and finished in detail. Both were vigorously and effectively played, and every movement was loudly applauded. The Sonata in B minor, for pianoforte and violin, was also beautifully given by Dr. Heap and Herr Ludwig. The performance of the concerto for flute, violin, and pianoforte, was not a good one—imperfect in intonation, and wanting in precision. The violin and the violoncello solos—the former consisting of the Preludio, Loure, Gavotte, and Rondo from the Suite in E, and the latter of the Allemande, Courante, Sarabande, and two Gavottes from the Suite in D, were remarkably fine examples of playing. M. Vieuxtemps was unanimously recalled, and gave a repetition of the Gavottes. The playing of the two Preludes and Fugues from the Well-tempered Clavier showed how perfectly Dr. Heap's hand had been disciplined, and how thoroughly he had studied the highest forms of musical composition. Every bar was characterized by beautiful phrasing, and by the utmost distinctness. The difficult fugue in G minor was also well given by Mr. Stratton.

There was a fairly good attendance in the front seats, and a large attendance in the back seats. There were no encores excepting that of the violoncello solo, but loud applause showed that the audience appreciated the efforts of the performers.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

Herr Herbeck has at length produced Gluck's Iphigenia auf Tauris at the Imperial Operahouse. It was most favourably received by the public. Herr Walter sang the part of Pylades; Herr Labatt, that of Orestes; Herr Krauss, that of King Thoas; and Mdme Dustmann, that of Iphigenia.—Several important engagements have lately been made for the new Comic Opera. Among the artists secured may be mentioned Herr Anton Erl, from the Royal Opera, Dresden, and son of the well-known Joseph Erl; Herr Hermany, barytone, from the Stadttheater, Cologne; and Mdlle Elise Deichmann, from Prague. Herr M. Auger, of Salzburg, has been appointed conductor. Herr Proch is busily engaged in selecting the members of the orchestra, and will visit, for this purpose, next month, Pesth, Prague and Gratz.—Handel's Saul was performed in the large room of the Musical Union, under the direction of Herr Brahms, on the 28th February, for the first time in this capital! The solos were sung by Mesdames Bettelheim-Gomperz, Dustmann, Herren Scaria, Walter and Maas. The members of the Musical Union formed a most efficient chorus, whose training reflects the highest credit on Herr Brahms. The whole performance was a great success. Remarking on the fact that this was the first performance of Saul in Vienna, the correspondent of the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung says: "However impatiently we may turn over the old bills, we find Saul mentioned neither in those of the Concerts of Sacred Music at the Theater an der Wien, (1806, 1807, &c.,) nor in those of the Festivals of the Society of the Friends of Music, whose first effort (1812—1816), was the performance of Handel's oratorios, nor, lastly, in those of the Society of Musicians when it shook off its exclusive worship of Haydn, and from 1820 to 1830 alternated oratorios by Handel with Haydn's two Cantatas. Even the grand private performances at van Swieten's, the spring from which the knowledge and culture of Handel's works first flowed among the Viennese, knew nothing of Saul. Mozart did not, by strengthened instrumentation, bring it, as he brought other oratorios by the same composer, nearer his contemporaries; while even Mosel refrained from gratifying on it his well-meaning but ill-advised passion for arranging. Had a tolerably regular Handel-cultus been established in Vienna, as in England, or even in North Germany, it would have been an impossibility for Saul to have been ignored during quite one hundred and thirty years. The periodical interest for Handel, bursting out by fits and starts, at intervals of several years, in Vienna, was satisfied by a limited series including Samson, Jephtha, The Messiah, Timotheus, Belshazzar and Judas Maccabæus. The rich stores of Handel's productions could not be exhausted at the sporadic musical festivals of old Vienna, and thus it was reserved for new Vienna, musically reformed, to make the acquaintance of Saul. Johannes Brahms deserves great credit for having produced here, in a manner worthy of it, this oratorio, which we unhesitatingly pronounce the most beautiful and most powerful Handel wrote."

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

"Micarème," the excuse, this side of the water, for Mid-Lent revelry, of which masques are the grand feature, has rather withdrawn attention from the Opera. The répertoire of the last week, however, consisted of La Sirène (Auber), La Traviata, and Rigoletto. A bal masqué took place on Saturday. The overture to La Syrène was familiar to me, but I do not remember to have seen the opera before. It went off well, Madame Depoitiers and M. Bresson singing their best. The chorus, which has decidedly improved since its sojourn in Boulogne, (effects of the sea air possibly,) gave one chorus especially well, "Noble etat d'en je suis fière," the "noble etat" referred to being that of a brigand. Of La Traviata I need only say that it was as well played and sung as usual. Rigoletto was produced on Tuesday, and "went off" from beginning to end without a hitch. The artists were evidently well up in Verdi's popular opera. With a caste including Mesdames Depoitiers, Noaille, Champenon, and Messieurs Bresson, Fronty, Depoiters, Kinnel, &c., it could not be otherwise. The Duo between Rigoletto (Fronty) and his daughter, Gilda (Depoltiers), in the third act, was superbly sung.

I must not omit to mention that we have a divertissement between the acts on every occasion now, danced by Mdlles. Osmond and Ayelle. The one last night was entitled Le Carnaval de Venise. (May I suggest, in parenthesis, that it reminded me of "Old times," I mean "Vieuxtemps"?).

Our ball for British charities, in spite of "envy, hatred, malice and all uncharitableness" being brought to bear on it—even so far as in the shape of a notice and warning from an English pulpit here on Sunday last—was a great success. The best English and French, numbering 105, came and danced in a not over-crowded, but prettily "got-up" ball-room, to the strains of a good band, and I have not heard of any casualties yet, "murders or sudden deaths," among the said 105, who dared to do so. It strikes me that the observance of Lent means an extra service on Wednesdays and Fridays, at which the ladies admire or run down one another's new or old bonnets, and at which there is always a collection for the parson! S. C.

CAIRO.—Madame Parepa-Rosa has made a hit in Martha at the Vice-Royal Theatre. She was shortly to appear as Donna Anna in Don Giovanni.—Next season, Signora Stolz will receive, as salary, at the above theatre, 150,000 francs; Signora Waldmann, 60,000; and Signor Fancelli, 100,000.

MUSIC IN SYDNEY.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Miss Alice May's Gallery of Illustration has been patronised by Lady Robinson (not Her Excellency, although her husband is His Excellency!—poor lady, as badly off as the wife of a bishop!) and suite; the Commodore of H.M.S. Clio, the officers (who kindly lent their band on one occasion), and the élite of Society. Miss May's Fleurette, in the Rose of Auvergne, is pronounced perfect by the press; and as Charlie, an officer, in the burlesque, The Belle of Wooloomooloo, partly written by Grosvenor Bunster, and with music by G. B. Allen, she is equally successful. Hear what the gallant Punch says:—"All who have witnessed the illustration of this programme are unanimous in their approval, and Miss May can at least congratulate herself with the reflection that she has added vastly to her reputation as one of the most charming singers and actresses we have ever had here. Her company is now visiting some of the towns up the country, after which we hear that it will go to Queensland."

The pantomime is still doing well at the Victoria Theatre, but the subject is scarcely suitable for the delectation of children. The Royal Magnet troupe have broken up, and some of them have gone to New Zealand, and others to Queensland. The great Inter-colonial festival in Melbourne was a great commercial failure. In point of art the only thing of interest was a selection from Mr. Packer's oratorio, The Crown of Thorns; but this, from various causes, was not satisfactorily given.

Sydney, Jan. 15.

SCOTTISH MUSICAL CRITICISM.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—I beg you kindly to insert the following two criticisms which will just show to the public how little musical criticism is to be depended upon in Scotland. The first is from the Scotsman and the other from a Glasgow correspondent to your paper. The Scotsman, commenting at length on Mdlle. Torriani's singing at the Edinburgh Theatre Royal, as Leonora in Il Trovatore, says among other things:—

"She (Mdlle. Torriani) has a rich, mellow, sympathetic voice; best perhaps in the lower register; her method is good, her intonation always perfect, her appearance is in her favour, and, though evidently very young, she is a fairly good actress."

From Glasgow however we are favoured thus:—

"Mdlle. Torriani made an undoubted and well-deserved success as Lucia. She possesses a good soprano voice, nearly always in tune, powerful in the upper register, but somewhat weak in the middle and lower. Her Leonora in Trovatore was not so good; she regained her former position, however, as Gilda in Rigoletto."

I think no further remarks are needed, as the two above-mentioned criticisms speak quite sufficiently for themselves and for the present state of musical criticism in Scotland. A Looker-on.

Edinburgh, March 22, 1873.

[We will not draw any inferences as to Scottish musical criticism from the very different opinions "A Looker-on" has laid before us. It is manifest that both reports cannot be true, and, as we know and trust our Glasgow correspondent, we have an opinion as to where the error lies. —Ed. M. W.]

Milan.—Signor Bulterini has left the Scala and set out for America. In consequence of his departure, Fosca, the new opera by Senhor Gomez, cannot be performed again this season.—Herr von Flotow's last work, L'Ombra, has been produced with much success at the Teatro della Commedia. The first act pleased more than the second and third, and the third more than the second, but they all met with the decided approbation of the audience. The artists, Signore Suardi-Repetto, Augustoni, Signori Karl and Graziosi, were greatly applauded. There is a report that Signor Bottesini's Ali Baba will be given at this house next season. During a recent performance of the ballet, Il Rapimento di Fenella, the première danseuse, Signora Rachele Rossi, while executing a "variation," fell and broke her leg. The performance was at once suspended.

Madrid.—La Vestale has been produced at the Italian Opera, but with only moderate success. The artists were Signore Boccolini, Pasqua, Bracciolini, Signori Barbacini and Ordinas.

JOHANN BAPTIST PISCHEK.

The following is a summary of the speech made at the grave of the above once popular artist by the Rev. Herr Zimmerle:—

Pischek was not a king, but he was, in his lifetime, a right royal singer, whose authority on the realms of tone, and whose power over the human heart was joyously acknowledged by thousands! When, therefore, a few days ago, the news spread through the press that Pischek was lying at the point of death, his name exerted its old influence, and the deepest sympathy for him and his was manifested in this city. Of a truth, for a long series of years, Pischek was an organist of the Theatre Royal, and a favourite with the inhabitants of the town, highly esteemed as a singer throughout Germany, and far beyond her frontiers; he has left a lasting memorial of love and respect in many hearts, which he moved by the power of his song.

Pischek was born on the 14th October, 1814, at Mocheno, in Bohemia, where his father, a farmer, held the post of village-inspector. Even as a boy, Pischek displayed high musical gifts, and, if the bias of the heart is the voice of fate, we cannot be astonished that his taste for music exerted such powerful influence in the choice of his future career that neither the representations of his parents, the time he had already devoted to the study of jurisprudence, nor the difficulties, privations, and disappointments of various kinds attending the first years of an artistic career, could in the long run withstand it. On the contrary, they merely excited him to renewed exertions. He was one-and-twenty, when he made his first appearance on the stage at Prague, in 1835; but it was not till three years afterwards, when he obtained a fixed engagement at Brunn, that fortune really smiled on him. He got married there to Johann Heing, of Mocheno. On more and more favourable terms, he was engaged successively at Vienna, in 1839; at Frankfort, in 1840; and at Stuttgart, in 1844. In this last city he spent the longest, and best part of his life, nearly twenty years, and received innumerable proofs of appreciation, respect, and admiration from persons in all classes of society, far and near. Repeated journeys at home and abroad established his reputation in Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Holland, and England, where, on seven different occasions, he reaped a large harvest of laurels.

On the 1st July, 1863, Pischek retired; for, to use his son's words, he wanted to leave Posterity the undimmed remembrance of his voice in all its fulness and power, and so he never saw the time of which he himself wrote. However popular an artist may be during the palmy days of his active professional career, he is soon allowed to perish unforgotten in a corner, when his day is over, and other gods of earth occupy as Ideals his place."

After his retirement, he lived solely for his family, to whom he was attached with all the strength and devotion of his generous nature, and whom he was ever trying to benefit, as a most affectionate husband, and father, and as the careful and conscientious housefather. Death snatched away, in 1847, his first wife, the mother of two of his children; her place was taken, in 1849, by her sister, who proved a devoted and intelligent companion through life, as well as a true mother to her deceased sister's children and two of her own. Pischek gave them all a careful education, and saw the three elder ones established for themselves. Sometimes, but not often, he stepped forth from the family circle into public life again, for the benefit of an old friend in distress, a poor orphan, or some other charitable purpose.

Impelled by his paternal love, he went, at the beginning of the year, to Sigmaringen, where his youngest daughter resides with her husband. He wished to spend his Christmas with them. An affection of the heart, from which he had long suffered, was unexpectedly and rapidly developed, carrying him off in the fifty-ninth year of his age. Two facts of the end of his life characterise him as what he was above aught else: an artist and a Christian; a few hours before his death, he sang with all the strength of his voice, and a few moments previously to his drawing his last breath, he laid the cross with a steady hand on his breast.

With Pischek, his duty to art and his duty to God were one and the same. We are told that it is the heart which makes the theologian; it may truly be asserted it was the heart which made Pischek the artist he was. His strength lay in the vigour and truth of his feeling, in the warmth and fervour of his sentiment, which resounded in his voice, and struck, with irresistible force, kindred chords in the hearts of his hearers.

Bruges.—The lovers of music in this somewhat slow old city appear to be of an eminently practical turn of mind. M. Ketten, a favourite member of the operatic troupe, lately took his benefit in Gounod's Roméo et Juliette. Instead of flinging him bouquets, or presenting him with silver laurel wreaths, his admirers gave him six silver spoons and forks, a salad service, and a silver service à découper.

Amsterdam.—The Maatschappij tot bevoordering der Toonkunst lately gave a performance of Herr Max Zenger's oratorio of Kain.

BRISTOW'S "ARCADIAN" SYMPHONY.

(From "Dwight's Journal of Music.")

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, in praiseworthy encouragement of American art, have brought out a new symphony by Mr. George F. Bristow, a composer whose name is already familiar to us all through his beautiful cantata, Daniel, and his opera, Rip Van Winkle, and whose face is always to be seen among the first violins at our Philharmonic concerts.

The symphony, which was played at the third concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, on Saturday evening, Feb 8, is called the Arcadian, and is dedicated to the club bearing that name in our city.

It is to be regretted at the outset that Mr. Bristow has placed, or endeavoured to place, his composition under the head of "programme music," in which each part illustrates, or is supposed to illustrate, not the progress and development of an idea, but certain events or material objects which it is not within the province of music to describe. Any composer, therefore, who writes "programme music," either does not rightly comprehend his art, or is setting a trap to catch the applause of unreasoning and unmusical people. Mr. Bristow, not content after the announcement that his Symphony is descriptive of "the passage of emigrants across the plains, and their arrival at the new Arcadia," to leave the rest to the imagination of his hearers, has subdivided his description as follows:—

1. Allegro appassionato. The Emigrants journey across the plains.
2. Andante Religioso. Halt on the Prairie.—Evening Prayer.—Tallis's Evening Hymn.
3. Allegro ma non troppo. Indian War dance.—Attack by Indians.
4. Allegro con Spirito. The arrival at the new home.—Rustic festivities and dancing.

Furthermore, each part being duly ticketed, it is thought necessary to amplify the labels after the following manner. (I quote from the programme verbatim):—

Part 3. "The scene now changes to an Indian encampment, where the savages are engaged in a war-dance, preliminary to an attack. The third movement depicts the commotion among the Indians, who at the conclusion of the dance fall upon the encampment of the Emigrants, and, after a violent conflict, are repulsed. [The subject of this movement was suggested to the composer by General Franz Sigel.] The attack terminating in favour of the Emigrants, they proceed happily to their destination."

What there is in the music to indicate that the attack terminates in favour of the Emigrants instead of the Indians, I cannot perceive.

The Symphony might as well have been called "The Expedition to Santo Domingo," or "Stanley in search of Livingstone." (Subdivided Part 1st. The note of warning.—James Gordon Bennett in bed.—Departure of Stanley.—Thoughts of home. Part 2nd. Encampment in the African Desert.—Evening Hymn, &c., &c.)

Eliminating this very objectionable feature from the programme, I can speak of the Arcadian Symphony in terms of almost unqualified praise. The themes, except the Andante, are fresh and original; the interest for the most part well sustained, and the instrumentation throughout masterly.

The first movement (in E minor) opens with a beautiful theme which is given out by the viola, and which alternates with a second motive for the violins. The other instruments gradually take up the first motive until it is sounded by the full orchestra. A beautiful and intricate passage for the strings ensues, followed by a long succession of skilfully instrumented passages for strings, reeds and horns, which, at length, results in a sort of anti-climax and becomes tiresome. It is the general opinion of critics here that the extreme length of this movement detracts from its artistic effect.

The second movement (B major) introduces Tallis's Evening Hymn; and the orchestration here, also, is admirable.

This is followed by an Allegro ma non troppo in A minor, introducing a sort of Fackeltanz, wild as witches' revel on Walpurgis night. This is set off against a brief interpolation in D major, which renders the barbaric rhythm of the dance still more striking.

The Finale in E is a bright sparkling Allegro, full of charming fancies, which, gradually increasing to a Presto, leads to a sort of dance-measure, and forms a graceful conclusion to a work which will rank among the best that have been produced in America.

---

KÖNIGSBERG.—Madame Peschka-Leutner has been singing here with great success. Among the characters in which she appeared were Susanne (Le Nozze), Bezia, and Donna Anna.

BRUSSELS.—M. Ambroise Thomas's Mignon has been revived at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, the principal parts being sustained by Mdlles Dartaux, Devries, MM. Jourdan and Barbet.

ANTWERP.—Herr R. Wagner's Rienzi will shortly be produced, and Adolphe Adam's Brasseur de Preston revived.

ANOTHER WORLD.

Subjoined we give a synopsis of many important matters connected with human maladies, their possible prevention and their possible cure, from that most instructive and remarkable work—"Another World":—

Page 60.—The Pain Luller deprives the patient of all sense of pain without affecting any part of the system except the nerves of sensation. If the securing such a condition of the organization would be a desideratum in surgical operations, or in vivisection, would not the fragment, if only as a suggestion, be worthy of notice?

Page 68.—The Perspiration being the result of an effort of nature to throw off the impurities from the system, is it not rational to suppose that the microscopic and chemical examination of the impurities which the perspiration contains will furnish as it were an index to the "main body" of impurities in the system. The science of prevention, though in its infancy, has been partially recognised by Government, ex gra., in the appointment of officers of health, inspectors of nuisances, in vaccination and sanitary measures generally.

Page 72.—MADNESS.—The penultimate paragraph (see page 75) exposes a new theory, which, if true, would have an important bearing on the treatment and cure of monomania. In the interest of the hundreds of thousands of the insane, whose malady science is unable to cure, is not this paper worthy of some attention?

See, also, fragment, page 155. If that fragment and the theory before mentioned are inventions, it is surprising how, in many respects they stand the test of what is already known, and of the resemblance that one of the most distinguished writers on the subject has found between the state of the brain in monomania and in dreams.

Page 76.—THE DEATH SOLACE.—A suggestion of a desideratum which, though not as yet wholly realizable, may excite enquiry, and is, in part at least, one would suppose, attainable by able men.

Page 133 (1st paragraph).—If the observation has not yet been made as to the similarity of the process by which "tumours" are formed in plants and in the human body, would not this paragraph be worthy of notice? "The same footsteps of nature, only imprinted on different matter."

Page 188.—Practical suggestions for preventing evils to which children are subjected.

Page 220.—The Allmanyaka; latent origin of a peculiar disease, the result of pernicious stimulants. (Possibly this fragment has a value in its bearing on diseases particular in India.)

Page 195—GYMNASTICS.—As to the selection of the particular kind of exercise adapted to the form and constitution of the boy. The neglect of this a source of deformity and suffering.

Page 235—PHTHISIS.—Neglect of the incipient germs; detection and remedy referred to. (The particular means adopted are not given, but would follow a recognition of the suggestions raised by the fragment).

---

A recognition of the truth of the above theories is not asked, but that they should receive impartial consideration seems but fair.

This is asked in the conviction that it will be found that, prima facie at least, they contain sufficient vitality to generate thought, suggest enquiry, and lead to discovery.

If, as will be the case, the "fragments" are attributed to invention, the fact that such matter has been created by the brain may of itself be thought worthy the attention of faithful chroniclers of passing events.

If any one of the numerous suggestions produce fruit, the circumstance would form a remarkable incident in the history of the prevention and cure of disease.

[It strikes us that all the foregoing themes are worthy of the most serious consideration on the part of our most eminent medical practitioners.—D. P.]

UTRECHT.—The Bach Society lately gave a highly interesting concert, with a programme which comprised only works by the great old master. Among these may be mentioned the "Italian Concerto," "Concerto for two Violins and Quartet," and "Concerto for two Pianos and Quartet."

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1873.

EVEN in an age when the cacoethes scribendi is a very common affliction, a good deal of history remains unwritten. The fact may be a blessing, or the reverse, according to cirumstances. We may have too much of history in this or that particular form; and, having enough, the balance should be allowed to slide into the limbo of forgetfulness. But, on the other hand, it may be impossible for the supply to exceed the need. We want, for example, all that can be given us of characters and events which have already attained historic rank, and the want is more felt when those characters or events are slipping out of living memory to take their place only in printed record. This is why so much interest attaches to recollections of the great musicians who have passed away within the last half century. Beethoven, Schubert, Weber, Spohr, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Meyerbeer, Rossini, Auber—of these men we want to know all that can be told us, no matter how trifling. Life is made up of trifles, according to the wise proverb, and nothing that a man does, whose general career deserves study, can be destitute of significance. Yet, how many "recollections" are year by year extinguished by death, a record of them having been neglected by ignorance, or postponed by heedlessness! It is not too late to raise a cry of warning, and to beg those who know aught of the great dead to make public their knowledge. Happily we are able to give them an example for imitation in the case of an able musician, who, when a young man, was brought into contact with Mendelssohn and Malibran. The story of that meeting has been kindly placed at our disposal, and we give it all possible prominence, feeling assured that it will gratify every reader:—

AN EVENING WITH MALIBRAN AND MENDELSSOHN.

One of the pleasantest recollections of my early life is connected with an eventful evening I spent in the society of Malibran, the celebrated vocalist, and Mendelssohn, at the house of my friend, Mr. Vincent Novello. It was in 1836, the year that Malibran performed Amina in La Sonnambula in English, at Drury Lane Theatre, then under the management of Mr. Alfred Bunn. She was the first artist who received the large sum of £125 for each performance in opera, and the success of the engagement was well proved by the state of the exchequer on every occasion that she appeared.

I came to London for a short time on a visit, and being then of an irrepressible nature, with that delightful sense of abandonment to any pleasant impressions which only exists in youth, without the fear of critical judgment intruding to disturb them, not having had my impulses toned down by experience of life, with a great love for my profession and devotion to genius connected with it, I was naturally enthralled by that of the gifted Malibran. I went to see her in the opera mentioned three times during the week I remained.

In addition to her triumph as a vocalist, "tickling the ears of the groundlings with the most provoking roulades," the charm of her acting is difficult to describe. She scarcely ever did the same thing twice alike, but followed the impulse of her feeling at the moment. The effect she produced in the scene when Amina takes leave of Elvino, when she retires to her chamber above the water-mill, when she calls Elvino back to her as if she had something more to communicate to him, and says, almost in a whisper, "I love you," and rushes away as if frightened at her confusion, was one of the most charming and sympathetic touches of nature conceivable. To my mind it was a unique and perfectly fascinating performance; and to this day all those who were fortunate enough to hear Malibran in the character of Amina retain the same impression.

For the Sunday evening succeeding these performances, I had received an invitation from Mr. Novello to one of his agreeable artistic receptions at his house in Frith Street, Soho. On my entering the drawing-room I found amongst the guests assembled Felix Mendelssohn—his father, who used good humouredly to lament that all his life he had never been considered of any consequence, inasmuch as when a boy, he was always called the son of the great Mendelssohn, the celebrated Jewish philosopher, and in his old age he was called the father of the renowned Felix—De Beriot and Malibran; Mr. and Mrs. Anderson, the celebrated pianist, then in the zenith of her fame; Wilmann, the principal clarionet player of his day; Dragonetti, the king of contrabassists; Mr. Charles Stokes, a professor of repute and great friend of Charles Lamb; Mr. and Mrs. Charles Cowden Clark, to whom Shaksperians are so much indebted for their great work and labour of love—the "Concordance of Shakespere"—and other people of note connected with literature and art, amongst an assembly of about forty guests. Clara Novello had then recently returned from her studies in Paris, and had made her début in the public musical world. She sang that evening, "With verdure clad," so beautifully and artistically exhibiting the advantage of her training and lovely voice, that she delighted her listeners, and won their hearty sympathies and admiration. De Beriot soon afterwards took the first violin part in a quartet by Haydn, and charmed every body by the elegance and refinement of his rendering the melodious thoughts of the father of chamber music. Mendelssohn then reminded Malibran that he had heard her sing with great delight, on a former occasion, some national songs that she had composed; one called "The Sailor," another "The Drummer" &c., and asked her if she would sing them again. She consented directly, with a lighting up of her countenance that indicated some hidden thought in her mind which conduced to her readiness. She enchanted everybody with her naiveté, and the inexplicable charm and character with which she imbued her songs; and when she had given three, and the outbreak of applause had ceased, she came back to Mendelssohn, close by whom I was standing, and said, with a laughing twinkle in her eyes—"Now, Mr. Mendelssohn, I never do nothing for nothing:—I have sung to please you—will you not play to please me?"

The lady sometimes affected childish English when she was in a pleasant humour; so grammarians need not be shocked at the construction of the sentences. Moreover, she was Spanish, and spoke with a pretty accent which added a charm coming from her. Mendelssohn immediately complied with her request in the modest and graceful manner so natural to him, and she led him to the piano. He quietly ran his fingers over the key-board, in arpeggios, arranging his thoughts for a minute or two. He then took one of the melodies that he had asked Malibran to sing, and, having treated and varied it in his own original manner, introduced the second song, and amalgamated the two in such a way as to astonish the entire audience, who were listening with marked attention. When Mendelssohn had satisfied the revelling richness of his fancy, he suddenly introduced the third piece Malibran had sung, and wound up his wondrous extemporaneous inspiration with a coda in which all three songs were going on at the same time, and with such masterly effect, that the impression he produced was startling and emotional to a degree. The guests, when he began, were quietly seated and standing about the room, but before he had finished every chair and sofa was vacant, and the grand piano on which he was playing was surrounded—those behind standing on tip-toe, and stretching their necks to get a sight of his fingers, embodying in sound the momentary thoughts of his inspired genius.

The enthusiasm which ensued I will not try to describe; but that memorable evening and performance made an impression never to be forgotten by those who shared in the delight.

My vivid recollection of it at this distance of time seems to suggest the indulgence of another salvo of bravos, but as it is midnight, and the household are "in the soft oblivion of sleep—the universal asylum of nature"—I might scare them out of it, were I to realise the idea, bring the members thereof about me disguised like the ghostly nuns in Robert le Diable, have an extemporaneous performance of the scene in my study, and the malignant consequence arising from it of finding myself taken to an asylum of a more partial and less peaceful character; so I will padlock the desire, and end my record. HENRY W. GOODBAN.

Thanks to Mr. Goodban, the world is now acquainted with a very interesting little episode in the lives of two great artists. Are any other depositaries of unwritten history within reach of these lines? If so, we would point emphatically to the example of our contributor, and say—"Go and do likewise."

OCCASIONAL NOTE.

ROSSINI'S Guillaume Tell is about to be produced for the first time at Rome, where the subject of the opera could not but render it ineligible for representation under the Papal Government. It is to be remarked that this insurrectionary work has been longer finding its way to Rome than to St. Petersburgh, where, absolutely proscribed by the Emperor Nicholas, it has been performed many times during the present reign, with the distinguished tenor Tamberlik in the part of Arnold. At Rome (Apollo Theatre) the cast will include Aldighieri, formerly of Her Majesty's Theatre, as Guillaume Tell, and Lefranc, who some years ago sang for a few nights at the Royal Italian Opera, as Arnold. Mdme. Vitali, to whom the character of Matilda had been assigned, "refused it peremptorily;" and it has since been made over to Mdme. Contarini. Not only has Rossini's masterpiece had to encounter objections on the part of the prima donna; the composer Petrella has, in a direct manner, delayed its representation by insisting that his new opera of Manfredo should be produced first. The greatest believer in Guillaume Tell is said to be the impresario of the Apollo Theatre, Signor Jacovacci, who, under the Pontifical régime, was unable to get permission to produce it on any terms. When Verdi composed Un Ballo in Maschera for the Apollo Theatre, Jacovacci, to conciliate the censor, who had objected to the work, changed Gustavus III. into the Governor of Boston; but it would have been impossible, in a similar spirit, to transform Gessler into the President of the United States, and Guillaume Tell was forbidden in whatever shape it might be presented.

MUSIC.

(From "Another World.")

The power of music, beyond that derived from its mere execution, is greatly influenced by the amount of electricity infused into the sounds by the performer; and in our planet the human voice has often been known to soothe, and sometimes to restore, a disordered brain, by awakening the powers of some dormant division, when the electricity accompanying the sounds is sympathetic with the light in the brain of the listener. The human voice, other things being equal, is more electrical than sounds from musical instruments; for in the one case the emanations of light come direct from the living singer, whilst in the latter instance the electricity, coming from the executant, passes by contact with the instrument, and is thus transmitted through an intermediate conductor. The beauty and effect of many of our musical instruments, and particularly of the harp, are greatly increased by the application of electricity. A skilful executant on our harp can assuage the passions of a multitude—nay, he can excite many of the aspirations and sensibilities ascribed in your legends to Orpheus and other mythical personages.

INTERNAL CONCENTRATED LIGHT.

(From "Another World.")

There is concentrated light—the very essence of light—within ourselves, particularly in the brain, to which the light, having travelled about the body, is conveyed, through the instrumentality of the blood, to the nerves and other organs. In speaking of the brain, we often use words belonging to vision. Until the discovery of "concentrated light," we did not know how truthful were these expressions, one of which in our language answers to the "mind's eye." The eye as well as the brain contains concentrated light, and physical impressions received through the visual organs are by this electricity immediately conveyed to the sympathetic "light" of the brain. By the application of concentrated light we can even increase for a time the intellectual powers; or, rather, we can strengthen the instrument through which the intellectual powers are manifested.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

M. Gustave Pradeau's Second "Historical Pianoforte Recital" took place in the Hanover Square Rooms on Tuesday evening, when the talented French pianist played the following pieces by the old masters:—Italian Concerto, J. S. Bach; "Pièce," Scarlatti; "Polonaise," W. F. Bach; "Gigue," J. S. Bach; Andante and Finale, Weber; "Song without Words," Mendelssohn; "Valse," "Etude," Chopin. Besides the foregoing interesting compositions (all played without book), M. Pradeau joined M. Sainton in a sonata for violin and piano, and met with due appreciation from the audience, who were decidedly well pleased with what they heard. M. Sainton played, in his most brilliant style, an ancient sonata for violin (accompanied on the pianoforte by M. Thouless), by Porpora, a work abounding in difficulties, which M. Sainton, however, overcame with the utmost ease, and was rewarded with unanimous applause. The vocal music was entrusted to Miss Julia Wigan, a very clever pupil of Madame Sainton-Dolby, and Miss Mary Crawford, a young artist with a nice mezzo-soprano voice. Both ladies gave evident pleasure, and were received with every mark of favour. The vocal music was accompanied on the pianoforte by M. Thouless, and the concert altogether gave general satisfaction.

Gloucester Hall, Brixton Road.—The first of a series of popular concerts, under the direction of Mr. J. B. W. Thirlwall, took place on Wednesday, the 26th inst. The vocalists were the Misses S. and H. Pelham, Miss Annie Thirlwall, Messrs. J. B. Wade Thirlwall and Mr. J. B. Bolton, who effectively executed several vocal morceaux, both concerted and solo, by Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Schubert, Balfe, and Wallace. Mr. J. Bolton, in a song from Lurline, and in the new national song, "The war cry's hushed," made a decided and most favourable impression. The instrumental music was good and varied. Brod's trio in B flat, for oboe, bassoon, and piano (not often heard in public), received every justice from Messrs. G. Horton, J. Snelling, and W. Maby, as did also a very clever trio, by Mr. J. W. Thirlwall, for piano, violin and violoncello, well played by Messrs. Deane, Wade Thirlwall, and R. Snelling. Mr. Wade Thirlwall gave an artistic rendering of Beethoven's romance for the violin (in F), and Messrs. E. Deane and F. H. Hall, some solos of their own composition. Miss Harriett Pelham and Mr. J. B. Bolton gave Balfe's buffo duet from The Puritan's Daughter with spirit and effect. The concert ended with the same composer's sparkling trio, "I'm not the Queen," and was varied by dramatic readings by Messrs. A. C. Hall and Annesley. Messrs. E. Deane, James Halle, and F. Hall were the accompanists.

The St. John's Wood Society of Musicians gave their second soirée musicale, on Wednesday evening, the 26th inst., at Lyndenhurst House, St. John's Wood. The programme was varied and interesting, both vocally and instrumentally. Miss A. L. M. Okey, a very youthful pianist, from Australia, played exceedingly well Mendelssohn's Concerto in G, which was received with much applause. Miss Ada Percival, in Ascher's popular fantaisie, "Alice," was equally well received, as were also some solos of Sydney Smith, Thalberg, Wollenhaupt, &c., played by Miss Lucy Parish, Mrs. Fellows, Miss R. Folley, as well as a piano duet, "Golden Bells," by Misses Aylmer and Dell, all of which were loudly applauded. Amongst the vocal pieces deserving of mention were Cimarosa's duet, "Ne non credo," by Mdme. Simco and M. J. Barron; Verdi's duet, "Qual voce," by Miss A. Stanford and Signor Rugeroni. Mrs. Whiteside, also, in Donizetti's "In questo semplice," and Miss Bedford, in Ascher's "Clara," delighted all present, as did Mr. W. C. Bell in "Dearer to my soul thou art." Several songs were sung, and encored, by the Misses C. and M. Wade, Snowden, Duffield, Allan, Vennimore, F. Woolmer, Thomas, with Messrs. E. Lane, Greenfield, Danville, de Winton, &c. Mr. Lansdowne Cottell, R.A.M., and Mr. C. Webber were the accompanists.

Madame Eugene Oswald, a clever pianist, gave her evening concert at St. George's Hall, on Thursday, the 20th inst., under the patronage of the Lord Mayor. Madame Oswald had the assistance of Mr. Henry Holmes and Herr Daubert, with whom she gave Beethoven's Trio in C minor, and Chopin's Polonaise in C, for violoncello and pianoforte. She, in addition, played Schubert's Fantaisie in C, Op. 15, and Liszt's transcription of Wagner's "Spinnerlied." Mr. H. Holmes and Herr Daubert each gave some solos, and Mr. T. H. Wright, the harpist, was loudy encored in his own "Rêverie." Mrs. Harriet Lee sang Dussek's "Name the glad day," and an interesting new song of Mr. W. H. Holmes, called "Wishes." Miss M. D'Arcy and Mr. Spencer Stanhope also contributed some songs and duets. Herr Lehmeyer and Mr. Barth were the accompanists.

PROVINCIAL.

Birkenhead.—We read as follows in the Daily Courier of 20th March:—

"On Tuesday evening the Cambrian Choral Society gave a performance of Elijah, in the Queen's Hall, Birkenhead. There was a very good attendance. The principal solo parts were entrusted to Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Jessie Bond, Mr. Bywater and Mr. Orlando Christian. Miss Wynne is so well recognised as a first-rate soprano that it is but necessary to say that her singing was such as to justify the high opinion universally entertained of her great ability, especially as an oratorio singer. It was a perfect artistic effort. Miss Bond is very far above the rank experience has taught us to look for in local singers, and the interesting contralto part lost none of its charms in her very able treatment of it. Mr. Bywater, an established favourite with these audiences, sang in a way to give complete satisfaction to all. Notwithstanding his sad affliction of blindness, he took part in the concerted music with almost faultless accuracy. The important bass part of Elijah was carefully and, on the whole, ably assumed by Mr. Christian. In the choruses there was not the same precision and accuracy as in previous performances. The music is more difficult, but many of the defects were such as to indicate either insufficient rehearsals or incompetent instruction, or both. It is, however, only fair to the chorus to add that the support afforded by the orchestra was very inadequate."

Oxford.—Bach's Passion music was performed in Christ Church Cathedral on the 20th inst., to a crowded congregation, among whom were the Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne), Prince Leopold, and the Marquis of Lorne. Great preparations had been made by the Cathedral authorities, and a choir of about seventy voices, including picked members of the Cathedral and New and Magdalen College choirs, as well as a number of gentlemen belonging to the University, had been carefully trained by Dr. Corfe, the Cathedral organist. The music was well given, the choruses being specially deserving of mention. Mr. Neville, of Magdalen, and Mr. Robson, one of the Cathedral choristers, were the leading tenors; Mr. Hallewell, of New College choir, was principal bass; while Masters Cook and Whitehouse, from the Chapel Royal, St. George's, Windsor, were the leading trebles, and Master Wilson, of Magdalen, the principal alto. The singing of Master Cooke was exceedingly effective, as was also the way in which Mr. Hallewell sustained the bass solos. Mr. Parratt, of Magdalen College, presided at the organ, and Dr. Corfe conducted. Previously to the performance the early part of Evening Prayer was intoned, and the Dean, in a short address to the congregation, referred to the principal events in Bach's life, and exhorted those present to treat the composition as a religious service.

Edinburgh.—The Scotsman of March 25th, in its notice of the University Amateur Concert, says:—

"The annual concert of the Edinburgh University Musical Society was held last night in the Music Hall, which assumed its gala dress for the occasion, being decorated with palms and other hothouse plants, contributed by the Professor of Botany. There was a large attendance. Since its establishment, in 1867, this meritorious Society has never been in such a condition of prosperity as at present. Last season, a strong effort was made to infuse fresh life into it. It was brought more immediately than before under the superintendence of the Music Chair, the Professor agreeing not only to select the music, but to preside at the weekly practisings, and to assume the conductor's bâton at the concert. Steps were taken to have an efficient body of instrumentalists, and the concert of last year was a great advance on any of its predecessors. Last night, notwithstanding his still invalided condition, Professor Oakeley assumed the bâton, and his ease, precision, and perfect rapport with all the performers were as conspicuous as at last year's concert. The chorus numbered about 85 voices, and the orchestra 50 performers, including some from the Theatre Royal, some members of the Amateur Orchestral Society, as well as several instrumentalists from Glasgow, and a few 'winds' from Mr. Hallé's Manchester orchestra.

The orchestral pieces were one and all admirably given. The overture to the Occasional Oratorio was given on this occasion with additional wind parts to adapt it to a modern orchestra; the first movement was played with the good old repeats (piano); the second (fugato) was given with great effect; in the adagio Herr Engel's oboe played delightfully, and appropriate spirit was infused into the march which forms the finale. The Prometheus overture, one of Beethoven's earliest compositions, yet far in advance of the orchestral music that preceded it, was much appreciated. The Mozart Symphony, one of several which the composer wrote in the same key, less grand than the Jupiter, is lovely and tuneful throughout. The adagio, full of delicious melody, was played with great expression; and the trio of the minuet tested the pianissimo playing and the perfection of the 'winds,' the oboe and bassoon being delicious. The Cornelius march, a posthumous work of Mendelssohn's, written in celebration of a visit of the painter Cornelius to Dresden in 1841, though not up to the mark of the Midsummer Night's Dream and Athalie marches, has many beauties, especially in its two trios, and came in well at the close."

A WORD FOR THE CRITIC.

The musical and theatrical critic has doubtless as many sins to answer for as the average citizen, and no more. He is human, and is moved by pretty much the same impulses that guide the rest of humanity. There is no one in a community who gains personally more abuse. His motives are impugned, and he is made answerable for a long list of sins of omission and commission. If he tells the truth he makes enemies, and if he tempers his condemnations of bad acting and bad singing with a little charity for the player or singer, he brings down anathemas upon his head from another direction. The opera-goer who has arisen from a comfortable night's rest, gained while the critic has broiled his brain beneath the midnight gas, takes up his morning paper with his matutinal toast and coffee, and expects to find his own impressions regarding last night's performance reflected therein. If the critic has praised his favourite artist it is well. If not, the base varlet is prejudiced. If he praises some one else, he is bought. But the worst enemy the critic has to contend with is the personal friend of the artist. He may himself be in friendly relations with the artist, and his well-meant strictures may be well received by the sensible player; but not so on the part of the personal friend. The P. F. considers it his or her bounden duty to praise the object of his or her fresh affections at all times and in all places, in season and out of season. If the critic is not equally gushing, he is a brute and a hireling. Before the artist appears, the P. F. has bored the long-suffering quill driver nearly to desperation; or, perhaps, the indefatigable person has sought higher channels, and asked the editor or proprietor to cause his critic to gush. The P. F. is completely wrapped up in its object and knows of naught else. The object may be a second rate, third rate, or even a fourth rate actor; it is all the same. Nothing short of a first-rate series of gushings will answer the purpose. The P. F. basks in the smiles of the great being, and, listening to the small talk of its little circle, espouses all its petty quarrels and dislikes. If the newspaper man fails to look upon the matter in the same narrow-minded way and to champion the great being in all fancied wrongs, he is a mendacious wretch in the eyes of the P. F., and very likely in the eyes of the P. F.'s personal friends. The "agent" is often a bore, but the P. F. can give him points and beat him. We are not aiming to be personal at all in our remarks, but only to treat upon a subject in connection with which every newspaper critic could relate a long series of sad experiences.

And then, again, the public has a very funny idea of the critic's privileges and enjoyments. It is so nice, everybody says, to be able to go to all the operas and concerts and to all the theatres. They forget that each performance calling for a criticism at his hands entails an amount of mental and physical labour, more or less intensified according to the importance of the event and the dictates of his conscience in the matter of fulfilling his duty to his employers and to the public. After the public at large has gone to its needed repose, the critic, if he chances to be attached to a morning paper, hies him to his office, and with tired hands and fevered brain attempts to convey into print intelligibly his impressions, and these impressions each individual reader expects will coincide exactly with his own. Too little consideration is had for these workers of the night, and altogether the critic is a much-abused individual.—Orpheus.

Dr. Ferdinand Hiller (every musician will be glad to hear) will pay us another visit in June, special affairs preventing him from coming earlier.

The second concert of Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir, under the conductorship of its accomplished founder and director, took place at St. James's Hall on Thursday night. There was a very crowded audience, and the concert was an immense success. Details next week.

REVIEWS.

Lonsdale.

Il Nerone. Cantata, a voce solo. Del Signor Alessandro Stradella. Arranged and edited by Bernhard Molique.

This edition of Stradella's Cantata is issued in connection with a series of Gemme d'Antichità which Mr. Lonsdale has long been publishing in a manner creditable to his enterprise. It probably forms one of twenty-one similar works by the same unfortunate composer, now enriching the library of St. Mark at Venice; six of which were arranged by Halèvy some years ago, and published by the Paris firm of Escudier. However this may be, admirers of Stradella, and of early Italian music generally, will be glad to possess the Cantata under notice, the more because it was recently brought before the public by Mr. Santley at a Monday Popular Concert. The music is distinguished by all its composer's dramatic force, though quite simple in structure, and it shows with great conclusiveness that true dramatic effect is not necessarily dependent upon the elaborate contrivances employed by some of Stradella's successors. We may take the opportunity of expressing a hope that Mr. Lonsdale will continue the good work of rescuing from the limbo of forgottenness such undoubted "gems."

S. Wilcocke.

Stay, Pretty Bird. Ballad. Written by Knight Summers. Composed by Henry Barker.

This love song is neatly put together, and may be recommended as a pleasing thing. The themes are not remarkable for novelty, but they are well fitted to the words, and are good in themselves. The accompaniments are simple and correct.

Welcome, Ever Welcome, Friends. Ballad. Written by G. H. French. Music by Inglis Berven.

To the moral of this song nobody can take exception, but the music may justly be charged with the commonplace character due to extreme familiarity. Scarcely a phrase in M. Berven's music fails to suggest a whole class of similar phrases which have become common property. Apart from this we see no reason to find fault with the work.

Boosey & Co.

Thinking of Thee. Words by Augusta Webster. Music composed by J. Blumenthal.

This is one of the songs which our greatest tenor, Mr. Sims Reeves, has made familiar of late at the London Ballad Concerts. Yet, even without the powerful aid of Mr. Reeves's matchless talent, music so good and artistic as that of Mr. Blumenthal would surely make its way into favour. The song is one of its composer's best, uniting technical skill to grace and tenderness in an extraordinary degree. Any enterprise which brings forward and makes popular such music does no small amount of good in the direction of an improved popular taste.

Never More. Song. Words by Sarah Doudney. Music composed by F. Stanislaus.

This is another welcome contribution to song music, though not of a character so high as the one just noticed. The melody is extremely simple, but its force is heightened by judicious accompaniment; and the general effect of the composition, as those know who have heard it sung by Mdme. Patey, is satisfactory.

Gentle Thoughts, Song. By Madame Bodda-Pyne.

There are various features of interest connected with this song. It is the work of an old public favourite, whose name alone should suffice as a recommendation. The subject is a good one, happily treated; and the music, though not pretending to originality of effect or even of theme, is written with much simple and unforced expressiveness. Good use is made of a well-known hymn tune, by way of refrain, and the general sentiment of the verses will be a passport to the favour of many whose views of ballad literature are "severe."

The Stag Hunt. Song. Words by M. X. Hayes. Music composed by Prince Poniatowski.

Mr. Santley has made this very spirited composition so familiar, and its merits have so generally been recognised, that we need do no more than again call the attention of our readers to its existence as a candidate for favour. Amateurs with baritone voices, who delight to sing about achievements by flood and field, are here suited to a shade.

My Love Hath Smiled on Me. Song from Gareth and Lynette by Alfred Tennyson. Music by Louisa Gray.

The poet laureate's verses are here set with considerable taste and skill, and also with a simplicity which will make the setting generally acceptable. There is little in the music to call for observation, but presents scope in which a good singer might make a decided "hit."

The Maiden's Gift. A tale of the Sea. Words by J. B. Lawreen. Music composed by Edoardi Barri.

We fail to see much merit in this effusion. It is as simple as possible, but simplicity is worth little for its own sake. Indeed, simplicity is objectionable when the composer does not show that he feels the meaning of his verses, and that he possesses an ability to heighten their expression by means of his art.

The Rosebud. Song. By Madame Bodda-Pyne.

Madame Pyne is not so happy in this song as in the one previously noticed. The music lacks salient features adapted to arrest attention and impress the mind. It would be heard without offence, but it would straightway be forgotten.

White Snowdon. The English words by Mrs. Hemans. Music by Brinley Richards.

This song is No. I. in an edition of "The Songs of Wales," recently published by Messrs. Boosey, and edited by Mr. Brinley Richards. Not a word need be said in praise of the melodies of Cambria. Like all true national airs, they abound in distinctive character, and retain the faculty of appealing to the imagination which originally found for them acceptance. The work before us is an attempt by a Cambrian to give a successor to the ancient songs of his nation, and, on the whole, it is an attempt worthy of praise.

She Must be Mine. English words by Walter Maynard. Arranged by Brinley Richards.

We have here No. II. of the collection of Welsh songs just named, but the tune, in this case, is a veritable national one, possessing the true flavour of antiquity. Mr. Maynard's verses are sprightly and well-written. The song ought to have a good share of popularity.

When Morning is Breaking. Song. English words by Walter Maynard.

In No. III. of the Welsh collection Mr. Richards has given us an arrangement of the national air known as "The Pass of Llanberis," a very tuneful air and a pleasing. But if, as we suspect, Mr. Maynard's verses have nothing to do with the original words, it seems a pity that a translation has not been given. In cases like the present, music and words, at least as far as the purport of the latter goes, should be looked upon as indissoluble. A marriage which has lasted, it may be, for centuries, ought not, without good reason, to be made the subject of a process of divorce.

A Gentle Maid in Secret Sighed. Song. English words by Walter Maynard. Arranged by Brinley Richards.

The observations just made apply with equal force to the present case. Surely some story is connected with the original title, "Gwenllian's Repose," of the melody here adapted to words which have nothing to do either with "Gwenllian" or "repose." None the less, however, are Mr. Maynard's verses good verses, and none the less is the song, as it stands, a good song.

J. B. Cramer & Co.

The Songs of Wales. With accompaniments for Piano and Harp. Edited by John Thomas.

This is the first of twelve parts which will contain a selection from the national songs of Wales. The familiarity of Mr. John Thomas with his subject, and the evident care with which he has edited the first numbers are guarantees that the work, when complete, will be a valuable addition to national lyric treasures. We should add that a special feature of the edition will be songs adapted by Mr. John Thomas, and hitherto unpublished in a vocal form.

W. Czerny.

Chansonette pour Violin ou Violoncello. Avec Accompagnement de Piano. Composée par Heinrich Stiehl.

A short time back we called attention to some pianoforte duets by this composer, and have now to add that the work before us sustains the promise then held out. The Chansonette is undeniably pretty and graceful. It is easy, moreover, and might be used with advantage as a duet for pianoforte and harmonium.

Liebeszauber Clavierstück. Componist von Heinrich Stiehl.

In this work also Herr Stiehl's ability is agreeably shown. There is no great individual character about the music, but it is well put together and effective.

La Follette. Morçeau Characteristique pour Violon, avec Accompagnement de Piano. Composée par Heinrich Stiehl.

We have here an Allegro in A minor, of a lightsome character, with an episode in the tonic major of considerable interest. The work is adapted for players of moderate skill, and like the one previously noticed, may be used in connection with the two instruments which are now found in almost every musical household.

Festive Seasons. Six Pieces. Composed for the Pianoforte by Heinrich Stiehl.

This group of little pieces purports to illustrate such scenes of child life as "Home for the Holidays," "Twelfth Night Revels," &c. They are all interesting, and all easy to play, qualities which should, in connection with their homely subjects, give them a place in many homes.

Novello, Ewer & Co.

Yesterday and To-morrow. Song. Words by Charles Swain. The Music composed by Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew.

Anything from the pen of Mrs. Bartholomew has a prescriptive right to favourable attention, and in this case the highest anticipations are justified. The song is charming in the adaptation of its music to its words, in the grace of its melody, and the musicianly skill shown by all its details. Mendelssohn, whose characteristics are here strongly reflected, might have written the song without the slightest reason to lock it up in his strongbox with his other too much depreciated effusions.

SACRISTAN AND LYRIC ARTIST.

By Ferdinand Gumbert.*

For many years the name of Formes has been well known in connection with the stage. Carl Formes, the bass, and Wilhelm Formes, the barytone, reside in America; Theodor Formes, the tenor of the Royal Operahouse, and Ernst Formes, the comic actor at the Wallner Theatre, live in Berlin. Carl Formes, however, is the theatrical progenitor of the family; Wilhelm and Theodor are his brothers, and Ernst is his eldest son; a daughter of Carl's, an actress, engaged at various times at different theatres in Germany, retired, on her marriage, into private life.

But how was it that Carl Formes, in 1841, sacristan at the Roman Catholic church of Mühlheim, on the Rhine, went upon the stage? This the reader shall learn in what follows.

The Theatre at Cologne, which opened in September, 1840, under the management of Herr Spielberger, might justly be called a model establishment. The opera, with an admirable conductor in the person of Conradin Kreutzer, was especially popular. The writer was then engaged there as a youthful barytone, and seizes the opportunity of stating that he remembers with pleasure his singing of the jealous Vasco in Das Nachtlager von Granada, and the love-sick Papageno in Die Zauberflöte.

It was in the autumn of 1841 that Herr Rousseau, Hofrath, who edited a daily paper, and was afterwards engaged on the Staatszeitung in Berlin, stopped me in the Hochstrasse, Cologne, with the words:

"Have you heard our Mühlheim sacristan, Formes? He is creating a tremendous sensation with his colossal voice at the concerts for the Cathedral building-fund."

On my replying that, in consequence of having so much to do at the theatre, I had not yet been able to attend any of the concerts, he continued:

"Formes has the strongest wish to go on the stage. I will send him to you. Try his voice, and, if you approve of his notion, interest yourself in the poor fellow's behalf; I think you will be doing a good work."

With these words, Herr Rousseau left me.

A few days afterwards—I was taking my coffee in the morning—I heard ponderous footsteps ascending the stairs. It was not the hasty tread of the messenger from the theatre, or of the postman, the only persons who paid such an early visit. Who could it be? Listen! There was a knock. "Come in!" I cried.—Before me stood a tall, sturdy individual, with strongly-marked, intelligent features, the effect of which was advantageously set off by long black hair, falling down his back. He answered my interrogating glance by an easy salutation, and the words:

"My name is Formes; I should like to go on the stage. Herr Rousseau said you would be kind enough to try me."

"Certainly! What would you like to sing me?"

"Well, if you have no objection, the air: 'In diesen heiligen Hallen,' from Die Zauberflöte."

"Bon."

I immediately seated myself at my grand—pianinos were not then invented—and, after the prelude, Formes began, boldly and calmly, Sarastro's strophes.

What were my feelings after the first few notes? Born and bred in Berlin, I had enjoyed numerous opportunities of hearing fine voices, but such a bass voice, so strong and sonorous, and, at the same time, so noble and soft, I had never known. I was involuntarily so much moved that my eyes filled with tears. Scarcely had Formes finished, before I exclaimed: "You have a wonderfully fine voice; every one must like it." I then continued: "And so you want to go on the stage do you?"—"Yes." "How old are you?"—"Twenty-seven." "Are you married?"—"Yes." "Have you any children?"—"Two."

I had thrown out rapidly all these questions to conceal the great state of excitement I was in. Before me stood the father of a family who wanted to give up a small but certain means of livelihood, and I, a bachelor, with no family to support, was to decide the matter. I felt very sad and anxious. I begged Formes to be seated a moment or two; and, while I drank the remainder of my coffee, which had grown quite cold, I found time to make up my mind.

"My dear Herr Formes," I began, "you have a magnificent bass voice; I have never heard one like it; you sing, moreover, purely, and with warm and natural feeling; you appear, also, strong and healthy. Here are certainly the materials for a good singer. I take it for granted that your industry will in future be as great as your fancy now. Yet, to speak frankly, I consider myself too young and inexperienced to decide alone so momentous a question. You are the sacristan at the church in Mühlheim; you are the father of a family; your place provides you with the means of support. If you are fortunate, it is very possible that, as a singer, you may earn more in one evening than your salary at present for the whole year; it is, however, also possible that, if you are not successful on the stage, you will long again for your present tranquil and certain existence. Consult, therefore, a competent judge; I will speak this very day to our old conductor, Kreutzer; let his opinion decide. Come and see me again at the same time to-morrow morning, and you shall hear more."

We shook hands. Formes disappeared as quietly as he had come, and I heard his heavy steps gradually die away in the Comödienstrasse.

As for the decision of our conductor—despite his sixty years, full of good spirits and humour.—I did not for a moment entertain a doubt about it; I was merely influenced by a desire, honourable enough, not to assume alone all the responsibility.

Things turned out as I had foreseen. Kreutzer had heard Formes sing at a concert for the Cathedral Building Fund, and said that my opinion of his voice was perfectly correct. He wound up by exclaiming: "Such a voice must not perish in a corner."

"Well, my dear conductor," I observed, "Formes has, at present, not much more than the raw material; he must learn a great deal, before he can appear on any stage; be his good angel, and give him lessons."

"That is what I can't do," replied Kreutzer; "I am town-conductor, and theatrical conductor; I am bound to send things to my publishers; where can I find time for giving lessons? You can do that; in my opinion you have the stuff in you for it. Take my word, if Formes is industrious, we shall all three have reason to be pleased."

With these words, Conradin Kreutzer dismissed me.

The next morning, Formes appeared punctually at the appointed hour—he had served his time in the artillery. On my informing him that Kreutzer approved of his idea, and had designated me as his master, he burst into tears and fell upon my neck. He expressed his deep regret at not having the means to pay me for my lessons, and promised solemnly always to be industrious and obedient.

But, with regard to lessons, words were easier than deeds. Formes was obliged by his situation to be all day in Mühlheim—an hour's walk from Cologne; I myself had rehearsals of a morning, and frequently of an afternoon also, while in the evening (having agreed to play in spoken drama as well as opera) I generally had to perform. Thus the only time at our disposal was after the theatre.

Thrice a week did Formes come to me across the Rhine, and anyone then passing along the Comödienstrasse, between ten and twelve at night, might have heard my pupil, the sacristan, practising, with all his voice, his scales and solfeggios on the second floor of the small house (two houses from the Theatre), belonging to Herr Brauer, the trimming-maker.

The longer I gave Formes lessons, the more pleased was I with his natural talent for music, his quick conception, and his great skill in singing after me melismata, figures and cadences. He was especially enthusiastic for Italian cantilenas, and was so indefatigable in studying them that I had frequently to turn him out, because I required a little rest. Had I allowed him, he would certainly have gone on singing till the morning. For my own part, inspired with all the enthusiasm of youth, I was never tired of listening to his voice, so melodious was it. After six weeks' lessons, Formes had two octaves (from the low to the high E flat), of perfectly equal and beautiful tone, in his throat. Moreover, there was something so noble and inspired in the timbre of his voice, while his style had something so grandly simple and touching about it, that my eyes were many a time suffused with tears. But I did not dare let my pupil see this, for I soon perceived, despite all his frankness and unaffected manners, a tendency to vain self-sufficiency. I, also, considered it my duty to warn him—for, like most Rhinelanders, while open and loyal, Formes was too fond of talking over a glass of wine—against letting his theatrical project become known. I represented to him that the priests would immediately discharge a sacristan who meant to go upon the stage, and that he was not yet far enough advanced at once to embrace with any chance of success the career of a singer; I told him he ought to think of his family, and be more prudent. But my warnings were not of much good. In vino veritas—wine-shops are the natural enemies of secrecy. Thus even the sparrows on the housetops soon knew that Formes, the sacristan, would shortly come out upon the stage.

In consequence of this unfortunate turn taken by matters, I was under the necessity of adopting active measures, since Formes had so thoughtlessly risked his means of livelihood. I consulted with the manager, Herr Spielberger, who said he was willing to let Formes make his début directly he knew a few parts. I fixed upon Sarastro as the first, one reason being that it required only quiet recitative and no acting.

I need scarcely say that we could no longer follow our previous mode of instruction. As we had reason to dread that the sacristan might any day be discharged, we had to profit by every available instant so as to get up a few characters in order that the singer might be ready when the explosion came. Formes was, in this respect, particularly favoured by fate. The voice of our bass singer, Oehrlein, had for some time past—in consequence, it was said, of too free a life—deteriorated very considerably; for instance, he frequently sang too low, and he had on several occasions, despite his former popularity, met with a spirit of opposition on the part of the Cologne public, who do not possess very tender feelings, which touched him deeply. Thus there was the prospect of a vacancy, into which Formes, provided only he succeeded—and on that head I did not entertain a moment's doubt—could immediately slip.

The reader may easily believe that I worked very hard with him—sometimes all night—on different parts; in Sarastro especially I made him letter-perfect. Thus he was prepared, and we were able to await calmly the day when his wishes should be fulfilled.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.—Rossini's Stabat Mater and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise are announced for performance at the Fourth Subscription Concert of the Society, which takes place on Wednesday, April 2. The solo vocalists will be Madame Otto-Alvsleben, who made so great a success in the Passion Music at Manchester, Madame Patey, Miss Emily Spiller, Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Bettini, and Signor Agnesi, Dr. Stainer presiding at the organ. The band and chorus, numbering over 1200 performers, will be, as usual, conducted by Mr. Barnby.

M. FAURE sang at the Paris Opéra for the last time this season on Wednesday week.

WAIFS.

Mr. Gye, we are glad to learn, has completely recovered from his attack of rheumatic-gout, and has arrived in London, to resume his important duties as Director of the Royal Italian Opera.

Herr Pischek, the well-known baritone, has just died.

Der Freischütz is to be produced at the Grand Opéra early in April.

The death is announced of M. Adolphe Fétis, second son of the renowned musical biographer.

The health of M. Coudere is almost re-established, and he will soon resume his duties at the Conservatoire.

Herr Leopold Sonnleithner, the friend of Schubert, died on the 4th inst. Both were born on the same day.

High winds have assisted in the demolition of the Coliseum, blowing down half of its trusses. Sic transit gloria Gilmori.

Lecocq's Fille de Mdme. Angot is such a success at the Folies-Dramatique that all the places are taken up to April 19.

Mr. F. H. Cowen's new symphony in F is to be given at the Crystal Palace on Saturday next, April 5th, and is to be conducted by the young composer.

The Plymouth Vocal Association give Handel's Israel in Egypt next month, with Mr. Macfarren's additional accompaniments, a band and chorus of 300 performers, and Mr. Lühr as conductor.

It is thought in Montallnyah—though it was never demonstrated—that a modification of concentrated light forms the point of union between the immortal soul and the perishable portions of man.—"Another World."

Dr. Ferdinand Rahles has been seriously ill for some time in consequence of a severe attack of bronchitis. His numerous friends will be glad to hear that all danger has passed away, and that the Doctor is now going on very well.

Mr. M. W. Whitney and Mr. Nelson Varley have been engaged by the Boston Handel and Haydn Society as soloists for the performances to be given in that city next month. It is the intention to give Elijah, Judas Maccabeus, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and portions of Bach's Passion Music.

Mr. F. H. Cowen's Cantata, The Rose Maiden, which was so successful at St. James's Hall two years ago, is to be repeated at the Royal Albert Hall on Easter Monday evening, April 14th, with Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mr. Maybrick, and Mr. E. Lloyd; an orchestra of eighty, and the St. Cecilia Choral Society, of five hundred voices, under the direction of Mr. C. J. Hargitt.

The Philadelphia Age has long been known for the excellence of its musical criticisms. We do not know who writes them but although in the main they are intelligent and correct, they sometimes contain funny things. A late one, speaking of Rubinstein's greatness, asserts that he must be very great because "Jno. Sebastian Bach, Jno. S. Dwight and Jerome Hopkins were agreed upon the subject!" As the first of these died long before Rubinstein was born, we suppose the Age has been favoured with a spiritual communication from him. Poor dignified old Bach! Just imagine it!—Orpheonist.

Mr. Cowen's Cantata, The Rose Maiden, was given at Miss Avery's concert, on February 8th, at Calcutta. Miss Avery is the organist of St John's Church, Calcutta, and was honoured on the occasion by a large audience. The local papers speak of the cantata as being one of the most charming compositions they ever listened to. The concert was given in the Dalhousie Institute. The cantata was to be repeated at one of the Fort concerts in aid of funds to purchase a new pianoforte for the Soldier's Institute.

Woman's enthusiasm is generally admirable, but when directed to the description of her favourite pastor is apt to out-run Blair's rhetoric, Since the era of female correspondents, every well-to do church keeps its epistolary gusher, and the latest nonsense comes to us from Boston in the shape of the assurance that a particular clergyman there is "a much admired colossal of the church—a man all eloquence, impetuosity, grandeur—an Alpine torrent, full of mighty pathos and ripe thoughts—a pulpit orator without oratory, and with no sensational halo to crush the brilliant mind teeming with its own power." Woman's ardour and Boston's imagery make singular havoc with intelligibility.—Arcadian.

On Tuesday a marriage of some interest was celebrated at St. James's, Piccadilly. The bride was Martha Isabella, daughter of Mr. G. W. Moore (principal of the Moore and Burgess Minstrels), and the bridgroom Mr. Frederick Mortimer Vokes (the leading member of the Vokes family). A numerous company of professional and private friends assembled in the church to witness the ceremony, and subsequently met at the wedding breakfast table in St. James's Hall. The bridegroom's sisters—Miss Jessie, Miss Victoria, and Miss Rosina Vokes—were three of the bridesmaids. The newly-wedded couple will leave England next week, the Vokes family having accepted a starring engagement for America.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was performed at the Paris Conservatoire on Sunday week; the soprano was Mdlle. Marimon.

When Mr. Boucicault was playing Kerry at Booth's Theatre, our friend De Witt got a phonographer into one of the front seats, and took the play down. Not long after, this report was published under a new name, and a French author tacked to the title. This play-book was fully circulated throughout the West, and when Boucicault got to Chicago, one of the sharp newspapers of that town discovered that the whole representation of Kerry was a literal piracy; and it published extracts of the De Witt version, and boldly asked Mr. Boucicault what he was thinking about to try and palm such a play off as original. Boucicault says he never before felt so acutely the peculiar sensation of being charged with stealing his own brains. He had long before grown accustomed to the charge of stealing other people's.—Arcadian.

How some people love to be humbugged, to be sure! Young Mr. C——n told us the other day that he attended Mr. Somebody's singing class. "Well, how do you get on?" we asked.—"Very well," said he. "What are you singing now?"—"Only the blackboard," replied he. "How long since you joined?"—"Two months." "And only blackboard all this time?"—"Yes." "Well, what have you learned?"—"The seven scales." "Seven scales!" we exclaimed, "why, what do you mean?"—"Oh, I mean the seven clefs, he told us all about them." "Why there are only three clefs," said we. "How could he teach you seven." —"Oh, I don't know, but it was some such thing. He said 'it was all scientific,' I can tell you." This reminds us of a young lady who lately bragged that she was learning thorough bass in the Normal College in Fourth Street. "Well, and what is thorough bass?" we asked. "O," replied she, all about sharp sixths and flat sevenths." "And what good is that going to do you?" we inquired. "It will teach us to compose music," was the answer. We suggested that she exhibit a little of her science on the blackboard, and we wrote a simple progression of intervals for her to sing, but this "composer" could not sound a plain third! Is this the way the city wastes money in humbugs? Is it not too ridiculous? We are here reminded of a story of a certain Sunday-school of whose perfection the superintendent was very proud. So on the visitation of the Bishop, the latter was asked to examine a particular class, the head class of the school. The first question asked was, "Well, my dear children, and how do you expect to be saved?" The tallest girl curtsied as she replied, "By Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, sir." The good Bishop passed on to the next class as quickly as possible.—Orpheonist.

BONN.—A committee has been formed for getting up a festival in honour of Schumann, who died here on the 29th July, 1856. The festival is to come off in the latter part of August.

PRAGUE.—The Musical Section of the Museum of the Kingdom of Bohemia have resolved to celebrate, next year, the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Tomaschek in a manner worthy the occasion.

THE MICROSCOPE.

CONCENTRATED LIGHT—MUSIC—EXPERIMENT ON THE LIVING MAN.

"The same Almighty Power that governs the universe of worlds governs the minutest particles of creation. . . In both is shown His infinite power."

The properties of our microscopes (as of other optical instruments) are wondrously increased by the aid of an electricity called "concentrated light."*

In our fields is found a little worm, whose body is surrounded by a beautiful and powerful light, visible by day and by night.

While meditating on the cause of this phenomenon, it occurred to me that the light was probably attracted and concentrated round the little creature by its own electricity. After many experiments, my great electricians found that this was the case, and many valuable discoveries were the result.

A machine, called the "Enticer," charged with electricity abstracted from this worm, is placed in a high open spot, and light is attracted and concentrated in a marvellous manner. When the pouch for receiving the concentrated light is fully charged, and secured against the action of other electricities, it is detached from the machine, and its contents are preserved for use. The appearance of concentrated light is that of a beautiful halo.—"Another World."

* In Montallnyah light in the ordinary state is said to be a highly attenuated electricity.—Hermes.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine, (Longman & Co.,) they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from, Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. PREFACE.

No country possesses more good voices than England, and many voices would be a fortune to their owners if they knew how to use them.

Vocal Exercises, however, are much neglected, owing, in a great measure, to their monotony of passage and of style.

The object of these Studies is to make practice as attractive as possible, and the Waltz form has therefore been chosen for its liveliness.

A selection has been made of passages best suited to give flexibility to the voice, and the six Waltzes here presented contain the germs of a thorough method of vocal practice.

The Italian language is preferred on account of the openness of the vowels; but these studies can be used advantageously without words, by simply "vocalising" on the vowel A (pronounced in Italian, Ah.)

Commas (,) are placed where breath is to be taken. At first, however, pupils should practise each study very slowly, and draw breath whenever found necessary.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION.

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

DEBUT OF MDLLE AMALIA FOSSA.

On THURSDAY, April 3, Verdi's Opera, LA TRAVIATA. Violetta, Mdlle. Amalia Fossa (her first appearance in England); Georgio Germont, Signor Cotogni; Baron Duphol, Signor Tagliafico; and Alfredo, Signor Nicolini.

SECOND APPEARANCE OF MDLLE. D'ANGERI.

On SATURDAY, April 5, will be repeated Meyerbeer's Grand Opera, L'AFRICAINE.

The following arrangements for the Entertainments of the Season have been entered into, and they will be carried out as nearly as circumstances will allow.

The present year will be the Twenty-seventh of the existence of the Royal Italian Opera, twenty-six annual consecutive Seasons of Italian Opera having taken place in regular and uninterrupted succession.

It has been the anxious endeavour of the Director, during the past recess, to render the entertainments of the Season of 1873 equally as attractive, and, in some respects, even more so than those of any former year. He has been fortunate enough again to secure the services of Mdme. ADELINA PATTI, Mdme. PAULINE LUCCA, and of Mdlle. EMMA ALBANI, the three greatest and most renowned Prime Donne in Europe; and also to engage an unusual number of young artists who will, for the first time, present themselves as candidates for the favour and approbation of the Subscribers.

The Royal Italian Opera has been for many years able to boast of the possession among its Pensionnaires of nearly the whole of the great lyric artists of the day, and indeed is still in a position to claim that advantage. There is naturally, however, a constant succession of young aspirants entering on the artistic career who, although they may not as yet have had great experience in their art, are nevertheless, on account of their youth and the pristine freshness of their voices, objects of great sympathy and interest to all those who take any pleasure in watching the progress of the Lyric Drama.

The Director, during a recent journey to Italy, has caused to be made a selection of several artists who have not very long appeared on the operatic stage; and it will be for the Subscribers, generously making allowance for youth and inexperience, to judge how far that selection has been a fortunate one, and how far those debutantes may give promise of obtaining future eminence in their art.

Madame ADELINA PATTI.—To say more of Mdme. Adelina Patti than has a thousand times been said, or to repeat the praises of her wonderful talents, which have so often been recorded in the annual announcements of the Royal Italian Opera, would now not only be superfluous but entirely unnecessary. There have been, indeed there still are, rumours afloat that Mdme. Adelina Patti has received from an American Director perfectly fabulous offers in order to tempt her, at the conclusion of the coming season of the Royal Italian Opera, to transfer her services to the United States for a lengthened period; and it is even said, and on excellent authority, that Mdme. Patti has actually signed a contract binding herself to cross the Atlantic in September next. It is, however, to be hoped that she may yet waver, and for some years, at all events, delay bidding her farewell to England. In politics our American cousins have lately outwitted us. Let them take their dollars and be content; we can afford the dollars, but our Opera cannot yet afford to part with its greatest favorite. Mdme. Patti will this Season, in addition to her most popular impersonations, perform for the first time, the part of Caterina in Auber's Opera, Les Diamans de la Couronne; that of Elvira in Verdi's Opera, Ernani —to be revived expressly for the occasion; and that of Luisa Miller in Verdi's Opera of that name.

Mademoiselle EMMA ALBANI.—Subscribers will not forget the deep impression made last Season by this most charming young artist; the beautiful freshness and purity of her voice, her chaste method of vocalisation, and the sympathetic style of all her performances, placed her at once in the very foremost rank of lyric artists. At the Norwich Festival, last September, Mdlle. ALBANI obtained another great and distinguished success, not only as an executant of Operatic pieces, but in the the higher path of Sacred Music. She also, during the winter, fulfilled an engagement at the Theatre Italien at Paris; where she not only received the homage of the most critical and fastidious audiences of Europe, but achieved the greatest success of any artist for the last twenty-five years, it being secondary only to that of Mdme. ADELINA PATTI. Mdlle. ALBANI will make her first appearance towards the end of April; and, in the course of the season, she will sing the part of Ophelia in Ambroise Thomas's opera of Hamlet, which part she has had the great advantage of studying, during the past winter, under the direction of the author himself. Mdlle. ALBANI will also sing the chief rôle in a new Opera lately performed with great eclat at Milan, entitled I Promessi Sposi, &c., &c.

Madame PAULINE LUCCA.—It became known at the termination of the last Opera Season that Mdme. Lucca had yielded to the temptation held out to her by the American managers, and had accepted an engagement to perform in the United States, for an extended period, and it was feared that her most valuable services must at all events for a considerable period, be lost to the Royal Italian Opera. The Director, however, most fortunately, although at great cost, succeeded in effecting an arrangement that Mdme. Lucca should return to England for the coming season. She will make her first appearance at the beginning of the second week in April, and remain in London up to the end of June, performing those parts, some of which she has made entirely her own.

The following Ladies and Gentlemen will appear for the First Time in England:—

Mdlle. ANNA D'ANGERI, Mdlle. IRMA SASSI,
Mdlle. PEZZOTTA, Mdlle. AMALIA FOSSA,
Mdlle. LODI, and Mdlle. ELVIRA TRISOLINI.

Signor MONTANARO, Mons. MAUREL,
Signor NANNETTI, Signor EDARDI,
Signor MASINI, and Signor OLIVA PAVANI.

FLORAL HALL CONCERTS.

These Concerts, embracing new features of attraction, will be given from time to time during the Season, under the direction of SIR JULIUS BENEDICT.

The following enumeration of the Artists engaged at the Royal Italian Opera for the coming Season exhibits a combination of vocal and dramatic excellence not even approached by the troupe of any other European Theatre, although encouraged and supported (as the Continental Theatres invariably are) by enormous Imperial, Royal, or Municipal subsidies.

ENGAGEMENTS.

Mdme. ADELINA PATTI, Mdme. PAULINE LUCCA, Mdlle. SMEROSCHI, Mdlle. SCALCHI, Mdme. MONBELLI, Mdme. SINICO, Mdme. SAAR. Mdlle. CORSI, Mdme. DELL' ANESE, Mdlle. D'ANGERI (her first appearance in England), Mdlle. IRMA SASSI (her first appearance in England), Mdlle. PEZZOTTA (her first appearance in England), Mdlle. AMALIA FOSSA (her first appearance in England), Mdlle. SEBELL (her first appearance in England), Mdlle. ELVIRA TRISOLINI (her first appearance in England), and Mdlle. EMMA ALBANI.

Signor NICOLINI, Signor BETTINI, Signor URIO, Signor MARINO, Signor MANFREDI, Signor ROSSI, Signor MASINI (his first appearance in England). Signor EDARDI (his first appearance in England), Signor OLIVA PAVANI (his first appearance in England), and Signor MONTANARO (his first appearance in England). Signor GRAZIANI, Signor COTOGNI, Signor BAGAGIOLO, Signor CIAMPI, Signor CAPPONI, Signor TAGLIAFICO, Signor RAGUER, Signor FALLAR, Signor NANNETTI (his first appearance in England), Monsieur MAUREL (his first appearance in England), and Monsieur FAURE.

Conductors, Composers, and Directors of the Music—Signor VIANESI and Signor REVIGNANI.

The foregoing list, numerous though it is, will, in all probability, receive additions before the commencement of the season.

Principal Danseuses—Mdlle. ROVASI (her first appearance in England), Mdlle. PERELTA, and Mdlle. GIROD.

Maestro al Piano, Herr SAAR; Principal Violin Solo, Mr. CARRODUS; Leader of the Military Band, Mr. D. GODFREY; Leader of the Ballet, Mr. BETJEMANN; Organist, Mr. PITTMAN; Suggeritori, Signor LAGO and Signor FORTUNATI; Maitre-de-Ballet, Mons. DESPLACES; Appointments by Mr. LABHART; Machinist, Mr. GARNSEY.

The ORCHESTRA OF THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, acknowledged to be unrivalled, will continue to maintain its high position.

The CHORUS will be under the direction of Signor CARLO CORSI, from the Opera della Scala, at Milan, and selected from the best Italian Choristers in Italy.

STAGE MANAGER .. .. .. .. Mr. A. HARRIS.

Artistes Costumiers—Mdme VALLET, Mons HENNIER (of Paris), Mr. JAMES, and Mdme DUBREUIL.

Scenic Artistes—Mr. DAYES, Mr. CANEY, and Assistants.

REPERTOIRE OF THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

L'Africaine, Meyerbeer; L'Etoile du Nord, Meyerbeer; Les Huguenots, Meyerbeer; Dinorah, Meyerbeer; Roberto il Diavolo, Meyerbeer; Le Prophete, Meyerbeer; Don Giovanni, Mozart; Le Nozze di Figaro, Mozart; Il Flauto Magico, Mozart; Il Barbiere di Sivigila, Rossini; Guglielmo Tell, Rossini; Otello, Rossini; La Gazza Ladra, Rossini; Semiramide, Rossini; Lucrezia Borgia, Donizetti; Don Pasquale, Donizetti; La Favorita, Donizetti; Lucia di Lammermoor, Donizetti; La Figlia del Reggimento, Donizetti; L'Elisir d'Amore, Donizetti; Lindi di Chamouni; Donizetti; Norma, Bellini; La Sonnambula, Bellini; I Puritani, Bellini; La Traviata, Verdi; Il Trovatore, Verdi; Rigoletto, Verdi; Ballo in Maschera, Verdi; Don Carlos, Verdi; Martha, Flotow; Fra Diavolo, Auber; Masaniello, Auber; Le Domino Noir, Auber; Fidelio, Beethoven; Orfeo, Gluck; Faust e Margherita, Gounod; Romeo e Giulietta, Gounod; Crispino e la Comare, Ricci; Freischütz, Weber; Hamlet, Thomas; Esmeralda, Campana; Le Astuzie Femminili, Cimarosa; Gelmina, Poniatowski; Il Guarany, Gomez, &c.

The Performances during the Season will be selected from the most popular Operas of the foregoing Repertoire, now consisting of Forty-four Operas.

It would be a work of supererogation to insert here the details of the Casts of the different Operas, the great strength and completeness of the Company of Artists in every department being a guarantee that they will be interpreted with an efficiency unattained in any other theatre in Europe.

In addition to the selections from the foregoing Repertoire, the following works will be given:—

Verdi's Opera, ERNANI. (For the first time at the Royal Italian Opera.)
Auber's Opera, LES DIAMANS DE LA COURONNE. (For the first time on the Italian Stage in England.)
Verdi's Opera, LUISA MILLER. (For the first time at the Royal Italian Opera.)
And a New Opera by Punchielli, entitled, I PROMESSI SPOSI, founded on the Italian Romance Manzoni.

IL GUARANY. Produced towards the end of last Season, and only performed three times, may also be considered a New Opera.

In accordance with a desire very frequently expressed on the part of several Subscribers, the Grand Work of Rossini, entitled MOSE IN EGITTO, will be revived, with New Scenery, Costumes, and Decorations.

THE SUBSCRIPTION WILL CONSIST OF FORTY NIGHTS.

But as there will (after the first week) be regularly FOUR NIGHTS in each week—viz., MONDAY, TUESDAY, THURSDAY, and SATURDAY—Subscribers will, by making known their wishes at the commencement of the Season, have the choice of selecting either Two or more of these Four Nights.

The attention of Subscribers is particularly requested to this privilege.

TERMS FOR THE FORTY NIGHTS.—Boxes on the Second Tier (for Four Persons), 100 Guineas; Ditto on the First Tier (ditto), 200 Guineas; Ditto on the Grand Tier (ditto), 240 Guineas; Ditto on the Pit Tier (ditto), 220 Guineas; Orchestra Stalls (each), 35 Guineas; Amphitheatre Stalls, First and Second Row (ditto), 16 Guineas. All Subscriptions to be paid in advance.

Subscribers of last Season are also respectfully requested, if they wish to retain their Boxes or Stalls, to notify the same at once to Mr. EDWARD HALL, at the Box Office, under the Portico of the Theatre, where applications for Boxes and Stalls are to be made. Also of Mr. MITCHELL; Mr. BURY; Messrs. LACON and OLLIER; Messrs. CHAPPELL, Bond Street; Mr. ALFRED HAYES, 4, Royal Exchange Buildings; and of Messrs. KEITH, PROWSE and Co., 48, Cheapside.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. VAN PRAAG.

MR. VAN PRAAG, who has been for many years past well known to the members of the Musical Profession, and the public, as holding a responsible position at the principal Concert-rooms of the West End, is now, in his 74th year. In addition to his failing health and strength, he has also recently become a widower, and is, by this sad bereavement, left alone, with not a relative in England to aid or take care of him. He has children in California who wish him to go out to them, and it is his own desire, notwithstanding his age and infirmities, to do so. Want of means for undertaking so long and expensive a journey, which his children are unable to supply, however, preclude the possibility of his leaving England. Under these circumstances, a few friends, well able to bear witness to his respectability, honesty, and courtesy in the discharge of the duties he has so "well and worthily fulfilled," are anxious to raise a Subscription in his behalf, to which contributions are earnestly and respectfully requested.

"ANOTHER WORLD."*

(From "The Morning Post.")

The syllogism and algebra serve various uses in the demonstration of truth. When an argument is put into an abstract or symbolic form the vis consequentiæ is more readily apparent than when it is couched in concrete terms that may be redolent of party strife, idiosyncracy, or national passion. This is the great use of the parable. David will yield assent to the apologue of Nathan, though he would deny its truth if the prophet indiscreetly commenced by saying, "Thou art the man." Hermes appears inclined to tread in the ways of the prophet referred to, and to seek to recommend his peculiar views of electrical science through the medium of a semi-spiritual communication from another world. He hints in the preface that the book contains a genuine revelation from one of the planets. It is not likely, however, that in any of these orbs there are rational animals, such as we are, although it is certainly still more absurd to suppose that those vast globes support no animal life whatever. The probability is that they do contain animals, but not human beings.

However, the author is entitled provisionally to the benefit of any doubt on this head. The revelations made to him relate to every province of legislation and social science, as well as to the minute details of agriculture, disease, and the ordinary acts of life. Yet the author, or editor—as he prefers to call himself—is in doubt whether the other world in question is the planet Mars, or not. This may remind one of the scholastic doctrine that spirits are not in loco, but ubi. It is hard certainly to give "to airy nothing a local habitation and a name;" and authors have been found who wrote long romances and dramas before they could settle upon the designation under which the Minerva of their brain was to be issued to the world and consigned to immortality. Notwithstanding these analogies it is a drawback to the credibility of the revelations made to Hermes that his informant, who is narrating his own exploits, cannot specify exactly the scene of his labours, and though hinting that it is Mars, yet he speaks of only one moon.† Bating this defect, however, the work is in the main philosophical enough; and though Hermes appears to insist, like Chatterton, upon the actual truth of his story, yet it will readily pass as a good, if not a sublime, effort of creative ability, seeking to invest the most complicated problems of life with an artistic colouring and a vividness of expression that may enable any one, however ill-adapted for abstract speculation, to enjoy the charms of an excursion into the more profound regions of social science.

The informant of Hermes is the king of the planet referred to, who by dint of genius greatly improved the condition of his people. The chief instrument of the reforms affected by him was electricity. This was even used by him to alter the specific gravity of bodies. Electricity, certainly, is almost as occult as what is called spiritualism, and can exhibit even on this earth nearly as great signs and wonders of its own. The editor or his interlocutor indicates much prudence by the use of so satisfactory "a medium." For a long time the theories of the savants in Mars proceeded on the assumption that there was only one kind of electricity, variously modified. But the progress of experiment showed that there were many varieties of the fluid. Accordingly, the monarch built a store-house where these electricities are kept, as it were, in bond, in separate receptacles. One kind is used for lightening heavy bodies or human beings. This, indeed, looks remarkably like "spiritual levitation." However, electricity may be correctly enough defined to be the spirit of matter; and nothing whatever recorded of its workings can reach the absurd, since what we know of its power on terra firma has prepared us to listen with equanimity to any accounts of its doings in a star world, an island universe, or a spiritual continent.

The properties of insects constitute a leading study in Mars, or, as Hermes calls it, "Montalluyah." Numerous are the purposes to which extracts from these minute creatures are applied. From birds, and still smaller organisms, are extracted various kinds of electricity, which is afterwards applied pro re natâ to the cure of a great variety of diseases. One of these essences is called the "pain luller," and corresponds with our chloroform; another is termed the "death solace," which enables even the dying to "give his last directions with a clear brain and a cheerful heart." It is a pity that the author, whose imagination is excellent, does not excogitate some more commonplace cures than those which depend on extracts from insects. This vulgar earth of ours may not own animalcules like those in the Star country; nor, even if it did, could we be able to catch them or extract the ethereal fluid without its losing all healing powers by disseminating the electricity around.

Some of the descriptions may remind one of Moore's Epicurean and Lalla Rookh. Mahometanism certainly is the religion best suited to this transcendental world. The education of females is well attended to, and by aid of various cosmetics beauty is "preserved to the last period of life." Partners for the married state, however, are usually selected there for the symmetry, not of their faces, but of their hands and feet. They "are instructed in the art of pleasing," and are compelled to exhibit towards their husbands the same complaisance after marriage that they did previously. The language of flowers, being of so æsthetic a nature, is cultivated extensively in Montalluyah. The frequent use of this symbolic tongue doubtless prevents the young ladies from talking too much.

The author's opinion respecting the relations of electricity to the growth of the vegetable world is not at all extravagant in the present state of our knowledge. General Pleasanton, late Commissioner of Agriculture in the United States, had two conservatories, the glass of one of which was coloured blue, and in this hothouse the grapes ripened more rapidly than in the one where the glass was of the ordinary colour. The Commissioner concluded that the blue of the sky has a beneficial influence on the growth of plants, and he constructed a conservatory for the purpose of making the experiment. It succeeded even beyond his expectation. There is no ground for objecting to attempts to apply magnetism and electricity to the improvement of vegetable life and growth. The theories of Hermes are practical enough. He thinks that "it is electricity that gives colour to plants." There is little doubt of it. Electricity is the great executive of nature, and Mr. J. S. Mill suggests that even every distinct sensation is preceded by an electric shock. The fiery spark, like the idea, or tertium quid of the schoolmen, is a fit medium, or connecting link, to act between matter and mind.

Some of the social institutions of Montalluyah are conducted on principles that have only latterly obtained recognition in the dull planet we inhabit. Boys are not blamed for being timid, but are cured of this defect by force of example. For instance, if a youth will not plunge off a moderately high rock into the sea with the other boys of his own age, he is not rebuked for his cowardice, but is sent to bathe with those younger than himself. He is thus shamed into valour. If incapable of study, the laisser faire doctrine is applied, and he is simply "let alone." Children are not treated to the same liturgy as elderly people. There are three different kinds of Divine service, adapted to the different periods of childhood, youth, and maturity. This is not an unwise arrangement; nor is there any fault to be found with another custom of the Star people—to render the liturgy as entertaining as possible to the young. It appears that those who were treated on the rule that Solomon recommends abandoned altogether the custom of attending church, as soon as they left the parental jurisdiction. All lectures for children are given in a similarly agreeable tone, and in a manner suited to the tender susceptibilities, yet often slow comprehension, of youth.

Animals are tended with kindness, especially if they are to be used for food; and any cruelty to the brute creation is punished as severely as "the Humane Society" could desire. Not only are plants and trees grafted in the Star land, but even distinct species are compounded and made to produce a new plant containing properties that none of the simple elements exhibit. Paper is made from leaves, and is thus reproduced without a change of name. Music is cultivated, and a love scene is depicted by Hermes between "a great harpist and a lady." Even in the Star land melody appears to have an Italian cast, for the harpist's name was Lenordi.

Every one in the stellar sphere "is engaged in that for which nature and education fitted him." This savours of communism. However, everything goes on well in that sublime region. Lest monomania might ensue from too exclusive a pursuit of a single study, the philosophers are made to relax their minds occasionally by amusement. The will or psychic force is not neglected, but on the contrary is cultivated with care, and with the aid of "sympathetic-attracting machines," which appear to be repositories of odic force. A love of tragedy has disappeared, and the people now prefer plain comedy or melodrama. "One day in the week is set apart for amusements of all kinds," and there are also certain days for the "introduction of strangers."

Ships in Montalluyah were formerly built "in the form of a fish." But as a vessel is intended to move over, and not under the water, "swan-ships" are alone built at present. "In the construction of the ship the outline of the swan is followed as nearly as possible." This kind of turret vessel, however, is not recommended for adoption by our navigators. The narrator informs us that some of the stars have inhabitants like ourselves, while others are tenanted by beings "of a nature and consistency entirely different to ours." Comets, instead of being on fire, are deluged with water, and our earth at the time of the Flood presented to the celestials the appearance of a comet. This is the only irrational statement, as distinguished from the improbable, in the book. Hermes is a really practical philosopher, and utters many truths that must be as useful to the inhabitants of this sublunary sphere as to those of "Another World." His forte, however, would appear to be that of pure fiction and high romance; for of his powers of narrative and effective expression there can be no doubt. The work is worth perusal, being an innocent attempt to sketch a society under physical conditions of life not wholly similar to ours, yet capable of suggesting to philosophers of our planet that there may be more in heaven and earth than they have yet dreamed of.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The Opera season began on Tuesday night at Mr. Gye's theatre, the work chosen for the occasion being the picturesque and gorgeous Africaine, which, as a scenico-lyric drama of its peculiar kind, may now be allowed to rank in general estimation side by side with Robert le Diable, the Huguenots, and the Prophète, though without the abstract interest of any one of the three. To expatiate again upon the dazzling, ornate, and almost everywhere characteristically expressive melodies and harmonies to which Meyerbeer has wedded this striking and original, but not always clearly intelligible story, or to say one word more about the wonderful orchestration, would be superfluous. The Africaine is now as familiar to the opera-going public, and indeed to the music-loving public generally, as any one of the masterpieces with which the regretted composer had previously endowed the Académie de Musique, in the Rue Lepelletier, and subsequently our own Royal Italian Opera.

It will suffice to state that Tuesday night's programme derived a new interest from the fact that three of the chief characters were entrusted to other singers than those to whom the Covent Garden audience has been accustomed. Madame Pauline Lucca, Signor Naudin, and Signor Graziani have, for some years, held exclusive possession of the characters of Selika (the African Queen), Vasco di Gama, and Nelusko. The earliest Vasco, in London, was Herr Wachtel; the earliest Nelusko was Signor Graziani; the earliest Inez was Madame Fioretti (whose place was subsequently taken by Madame Lemmens-Sherrington), when the Africaine first came out (in 1865) under Mr. Gye's direction. The earliest Selika, it need scarcely be added, was Madame Pauline Lucca, whose incomparable personation of the unhappy Queen became at once a town's talk. Upon the subordinate characters it is unnecessary to dwell. These are many; but one and all have been, from year to year, more or less adequately sustained by the capable members of Mr. Gye's always efficient company. With regard to the scenic contributions of Mr. W. Beverley—foremost among which stands the fourth tableau, with its grotesque temples and pagodas, its gigantic idols, its serenely bright sky, which brings out all in bold relief, and, perhaps, finer still, the scene of the Mancanilla tree, under the poisonous foliage of which Selika dies, gazing to the last at the ocean upon which the vessel is sailing that bears away her fickle and utterly heartless Vasco—it is enough to say that they are all before us as of old. The sea in the background of the last-mentioned tableau is as real and deceptive as the moonlit lake at the meeting of the Cantons in Guillaume Tell—both genuine art pictures, without reference to their studied effect before the footlights. What Mr. Augustus Harris has done for the stage business, especially in the fourth tableau, with its sacrificers, priests, and priestesses, worshippers of Bramah, Vishnu, and what not—its Amazons, Bayaderes, guards, &c., bearing shields, helmets, and spears of burnished gold, to say nothing of its varied and sumptuously costumed ballet—the whole a kaleidoscope with ever-shifting colours—has been frequently related. All is still there, as imposing to the eye as ever—a spectacle of its kind with rare parallels.

A few words about Tuesday night's performance, under the able and careful direction of Signor Vianesi, who again shares with Signor Bevignani the post of conductor in the orchestra, are now all that can be required. The new Selika, Mdlle. Anna Angeri, enjoys the advantages of youth, a pleasing appearance, and a mezzo-soprano voice of agreeable and telling quality. Hungarian, we understand, by birth, Mdlle. Angeri is one of the many pupils brought forward by Madame Merchesi, the well-known Viennese professor; and her recent performances at Mantua, where she first appeared, and was favourably received, both of Selika in the Africaine, and Leonora in La Favorita, warranted the Covent Garden Director in giving her a trial. The result last night was encouraging; for though, as a singer, Mdlle. Angeri has much to learn, and as an actress still more, she already evidences real promise, and in several parts of the opera made a decided impression upon a very crowded, though by no means enthusiastic audience.

Passing over details which, under the circumstances, call for no special notice, we may point to the great duet between Selika and Vasco di Gama, in the fourth act, previous to the solemnly-performed marriage between the enamoured African Queen and the Christian adventurer, as the situation in which Mdlle. Angeri shone, vocally and dramatically, to the greatest advantage, and deservedly gained the most applause. Her partner was Signor Nicolini, a competent substitute for Signor Naudin in the ungrateful, though by no means easy, part of Vasco di Gama. Signor Nicolini has evidently well studied the music, and sings it throughout con amore; but this duet is also his best point, and, bringing out his most finished and expressive singing, brought down equally the warmest applause of the evening. On the whole, the Vasco of Signor Nicolini is entitled to high commendation. The Nelusko of Signor Cotogni was very good—less striking, perhaps, than the Nelusko of Signor Graziani, and less powerful in the more trying vocal passages, such as the legend of "Adamastor," in the ship scene, but less exaggerated, and, therefore, more acceptable. Madame Sinico's Inez was, in its way, perfect, in a vocal as well as a dramatic sense. The subordinate personages of the drama were represented with unexceptional efficiency by Mdlle. Anese, Signors Bagagiolo, Tagliafico, Capponi, Raguer, Edardi (his first appearance in England), Rossi, and Fallar. We need not particularize each of the characters individually by name. The orchestra and chorus did their duty well, under the direction of Signor Vianesi; and the famous unison-prelude which ushers in the last scene of all was, as usual, unanimously encored and repeated. At the end of the opera Mdlle. Angeri was called before the curtain. To say further than this at present is unnecessary. There will be other opportunities of more strictly judging the new-comer. Previous to the opera, the National Anthem was sung by the chorus, and accompanied by the orchestra.

Mr. Gye's arrangements for the present season—the 25th since he first undertook the management of the Royal Italian Opera, which he has maintained through many difficulties, including the disastrous fire of 1856, at the high position it aimed at from the first—are full of promise. Besides the "prime donne" par excellence, Mesdames Adelina Patti and Pauline Lucca, added to the young and talented Canadian, Mdlle. Emma Albani, who last year created so marked a sensation, he promises several new and young aspirants. One of these we had a fair opportunity of judging on Tuesday night; another, Mdlle. Fossa, presented her credentials on Thursday, the opera selected for her being La Traviata, in which she sustained the part of the heroine. There are several more newcomers announced in the prospectus; but as they are utterly unknown here it would be useless to specify them by name. At the same time we entirely agree with the spirit of a paragraph in Mr. Gye's prospectus, advocating, on solid grounds, the introduction to his supporters of youthful aspirants with young and fresh voices, who may have made some mark, no matter in what Italian town, and —who knows?—may turn up to be trump cards. In addition to these we find the names of most of the old favorites, tenors, baritones, and basses, including, inter alias, Signor Graziani and M. Faure, the absence of either of whom, the latter accomplished artist especially, would be looked upon with anything but a favourable eye by Mr. Gye's most constant patrons. With regard to new or unfamiliar operas, all that is promised includes Verdi's Ernani, Auber's Diamans de la Couronne (first time on the Italian stage), Verdi's Luisa Miller, the Promessi Sposi of Ponchinelli, long known in Italy, but utterly unknown among us; and, last and best by many degrees, Rossini's superb Mosè in Egitto, which only stands second to the illustrious composer's Guillaume Tell.

PRAGUE.—At a morning concert given on the 9th ult., in the large room on the Sophia Island, Herr Aug. Wilhelmj was called forward no less than fourteen times by his admirers, who were evidently determined not to leave him in the slightest doubt respecting their sentiments towards him. Such an enthusiastic manifestation of opinion is about as rare here as an unimpeachable ut de poitrine in the chest of a tenor.

CRYSTAL PALACE ENGLISH OPERA.

Last week the Crystal Palace directors produced an English opera, in furtherance of their work as patrons of native talent. The opera had an interest of its own, because its production marked another phase in the development of our national lyric drama at Sydenham. When operatic performances were first given there, upon an extemporised stage and under makeshift conditions, the possibilities of future good were at once discerned; and it must be said, to the credit of the managers, that they have striven earnestly to develop their enterprise. A theatre was constructed some time ago, the "auditorium" of which has lately received the attention necessary to complete it. The floor now slopes upwards from the orchestra, so that all can enjoy an easy view of the stage; the galleries have been made comfortable; and the acoustics of the building, if not perfect, are, perhaps, as near perfection as possible under the circumstances. When expensive measures like these are taken, it is easy to conclude that Crystal Palace opera is a success, and that it will remain a permanent attraction, not, let us hope, without a good deal of future development. The building wherein orchestral music first found a popular home may become, in time, the nursing-place of English lyric drama, and we regard the production of an original work last week as significant of that desirable result.

The new-born opera is the composition of Mr. Charles Deffell, one of the amateurs whom the leisure of the Civil Service allows to cultivate, more or less successfully, the art divine. Mr. Deffell chose Lord Byron's Corsair as the subject of his work, and upon that famous poem its libretto is constructed, with sundry changes thought necessary, but upon which it is needless to dwell. From a spectacular point of view, no better selection could have been made, and much has been done by the stage management for an effective mise-en-scène. In point of fact, if pictures alone could ensure success, the Corsair of Mr. Deffell would have a long run. But at the Crystal Palace, where no "star" shines so brilliantly as to darken all its surroundings, the music of an opera is a feature of importance, and we doubt whether Mr. Deffell's music comes up to the requisite standard; as, when performed some time back in the Crystal Palace concert-room, it left an impression of crudeness, associated with a vain struggle for originality, and of pretentious effects unredeemed from the charge of mere pretence by artistic skill and taste. That the opera will keep a place upon the stage we do not imagine, and, therefore, to criticise it in detail is needless. We must, however, permit ourselves the agreeable task of indicating several numbers which show merit, and justify Mr. Deffell to make another effort. One such number is the air "Deep in my soul," sung by Medora in the first act. A violoncello obbligato is here happily introduced. The Turkish dance and chorus are effective enough to represent the opera in concert-rooms for many a year; and there is much to admire in a Sailor's chorus, as also in the trio, "Though one loving heart." Other examples might be named, as tending to show that if Mr. Deffell would take a more accurate measure of his powers, he would achieve a fair success. It is hard to repress a noble desire for eminence; but it is well to remember that "hood-winked falcons boldest pierce the skies." The chief parts in the Corsair were played by Miss Blanche Gole, Miss Heywood, Mr. Aynsley Cooke, Mr. Muller, and Mr. Nordblom.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

Mr. Crowther Alwyn's Mass in F was originally produced last year at a concert given, if we mistake not, by the young composer, on whose patrons it made a very favourable impression. The work has a double claim to notice, arising out of the youth of its author on the one hand, and its absolute merits on the other. Mr. Alwyn is undeniably a musician of much promise, having in him the materials of a good composer. At present, as scarcely need be said, he exhibits certain faults attributable to inexperience, as well as to the imitative faculty which is always strong in youth. But, though Mr. Alwyn's music sometimes wants interest, at other times employs effects which are common property, and at others again shows an inclination to run wild, these faults are more than balanced by genuine excellence. Not to multiply proofs, we will indicate only the vigorous setting of the "Credo," and the "Hosanna in excelsis," for a double choir. The last is by far the best number in the work, and, looking at its capital part-writing and its admirably arranged effects, we do not hesitate to say that a composer from whom such music proceeds in his raw youth should do great things in his ripe age. The Mass made a lively impression on the audience, who called Mr. Alwyn to the platform, and cheered him as he deserved to be cheered. The solos were given very efficiently by Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Severn, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. Other features of interest in the concert were the overtures to St. Paul (Mendelssohn) and Genoveva (Schumann), together with Mendelssohn's pianoforte concerto in D minor, played with great spirit by Signor Rendano.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.

The second concert of this most admirable choir was given in St. James's Hall on Thursday week, and attracted a very large and well-pleased audience. As Mr. Leslie's custom is, in Lent, the programme was made up of sacred music exclusively, beginning with a new Motett, "O Deus, ego amo te," by Mr. J. G. Callcott, who has so long and so honourably been associated with the choir's public doings. Mr. Callcott is a composer of acknowledged merit, and his latest work sustains his reputation by right of musicianly skill and an admirable facility of expression. The audience, though distracted by late arrivals, recognised the full merit of the composition, and called Mr. Callcott to the platform amid great applause. Mr. Leslie's excellent part-song, "The Pilgrims," made its usual success, and was encored; not so Palestrina's "Exaltobe Te." Palestrina, however need not despair. Bach is coming into fashion, and who knows whether we shall not presently extend our sympathies to the great musical reformer of Italy? Mendelssohn's Psalm, "Judge me O God," came next in the concerted pieces, and was sung to absolute perfection. All present had eagerly looked forward to this work, and all present joined in a demand to have it brought back when it had passed. The request was granted; Mendelssohn's noble music exciting the highest admiration a second time. Other selections in the programme were Gibbons' Motett, "Hosanna to the Son of David;" Schubert's Psalm for female voices, "The Lord is my Shepherd;" Gounod's "Ave Verum;" H. Smart's "Ave Maria;" Marcello's Psalm, "The Heavens show forth;" and a part-song, "Say, watchman, what of the night?", by Mr. A. Sullivan. Apropos of the last-named, Mr. Leslie informed his audience, through the book of words, that the corrected copies were sent to him only on Tuesday last, instead of Tuesday, March 11, as promised, and, consequently, two rehearsals were lost.

The soloists at this concert were Miss Jessie Jones, a rising young soprano, in whose favour we have more than once had to speak; Miss Edith Antell, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Santley. Our famous baritone sang "Honour and arms," Neukomm's "Confirma hoc Deus" (encored), and Gounod's Nazareth (encored), in his grandest style, by which, of course, we mean a style nothing short of perfection.

Mr. Leslie's next concert will take place on Thursday, April 24, when the programme will consist of selections from the works of Bishop and his contemporaries.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The Students' Concert on Thursday evening, March 27th, was given in the Hanover Square Rooms, and was very fully attended. The following is the programme:—

Andante con moto tranquillo, Scherzo (Vivace and Finale), Allegro assai appassionato, from trio in D minor (Op. 49), for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, Miss Troup, Mr. Jones, and Mr. Buels—Mendelssohn; Song (MS.), "Soldier, rest." Mr. L. Parker (second study)—Frederic Done (student); Variations in C, pianoforte, Miss Hutchings—Beethoven; Song, "The raft," Miss Mayfield—Pinsuti; Prelude and Fugue in B minor, pianoforte, Miss Borton—J. S. Bach; Aria, "Per questo bella mano," Mr. Pope (violoncello obbligato, Mr. Buels)—Mozart; Solo and chorus, "Placido è il mar" (Idomeneo), Solo, Miss Beasley (Westmorland Scholar)—Mozart; Allegro brillante, in A (Op. 92), for two performers on the pianoforte, Miss Hancock and Miss Younger—Mendelssohn; Quartet, "Ecco qual fiero istante," Miss May, Miss Buley, Mr. Howells, and Mr. McNaught—Costa; Andante con variazioni, and finale (presto), from Sonata in A (Op. 47), for pianoforte and violin (dedicated to Kreutzer), Miss Conolly and Mr. Palmer—Beethoven; Serenade, "Weary flowers," Mr. Dudley Thomas—Schubert; Andante and Rondo capriccioso in E (Op. 14), pianoforte, Miss Daniel (second study)—Mendelssohn; Part songs, "The Nightingale," and "Hunting song"—Mendelssohn. Accompanists—Mr. Eaton Faning (Mendelssohn Scholar) and Mr. Walter Fitton.

A "public rehearsal" also took place in the same locale on Tuesday morning last, when the following programme was gone through:—

A selection from Requiem in F (Op. 45): Chorus, "Blessed are they that go mourning;" Chorus, "Behold, all flesh is as grass;" Solo and Chorus, "Ye now are sorrowful" (Solo, Miss Jessie Jones); Solo and Chorus, "Here on earth" (Solo, Mr. Pope)—Brahms. Concertstück, in G (Op. 92), for pianoforte, Mr. Walter Fitton—Schumann. Air, "Be thou faithful unto death" (St. Paul), Mr. Dudley Thomas—Mendelssohn. Concerto, in E (last two movements), for violin, Mr. Reed—Mendelssohn. Recit. and Air, "The people that are with thee," "The Lord, He it is" (Gideon), Miss Beasley (Westmorland Scholar)—W. G. Cusins. Choral Fantasia, pianoforte, Miss Whitaker (soli parts, Miss Francis, Miss George, Miss Bolton, Mr. Dudley Thomas, and Mr. L. Parker)—Beethoven. Finale to first act of Le Nozze di Figaro (soli parts, Miss Jessie Jones, Miss Grahame, Miss Nessie Goode, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Wadmore, Mr. Aldersey, Mr. Pope, and Mr. L. Parker)—Mozart. Conductor, Mr. John Hullah.

An extra students' concert is announced to be given on Wednesday evening next, April 9th. The selection of the Hanover Square Rooms for the exhibitions of the students' progress is a move in the right direction.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

A crowded room on Friday week last was the result of announcing the performance of Mendelssohn's Lobgesang and Rossini's Stabat Mater. The vocalists who appeared were Madame Sinico, Miss Ellen Horne, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. All were in good voice, and Madame Sinico has seldom been heard with better effect. This was especially apparent in "Praise thou the Lord," and the duets, "I waited for the Lord" and "My song shall always be." In the Stabat Mater, "Cujus Animam," very finely sung by Mr. Lloyd, was encored; while the duet, "Quis est homo," by Mesdames Sinico and Patey, just escaped the same fate. Mr. Santley gave "Pro peccatis" in his own broad and effective style, and with the usual powerful expression. Sir Michael Costa conducted, and the chorus sang well. The organist was Mr. Willing. We must not omit to mention the admirable manner in which the symphonic movements in the Lobgesang were performed.

DINORAH AT THE LIVERPOOL ALEXANDRA.

(From the "Liverpool Daily Post.")

There are many operas which more abundantly satiate the ear with tune, and which dazzle the musical sense with a richer lustre of harmony, but there is probably not one which combines a greater variety of attractions than Dinorah, or which more closely approaches the highest ideal of a lyric drama. The plot is full of moral subtlety, the action is fraught with religious purpose. The dazed infatuation of Hoel, when in mad pursuit of the hidden treasure, is finely contrasted with the rapt concentration of his whole being after the terrible catastrophe which all but destroys the life of the already demented Dinorah on the problem of her restoration. Between these two subjects the action of the opera is divided; and the treatment by which they are illustrated may also be called Shaksperian in its fidelity to the glinting lights and shades of human circumstances and character. As a mere study of local atmosphere the first act—taking place in a wildly-situated cottage, where the fanatic treasure-seeker Hoel, the distraught girl whom he has deserted for gain, and the cunning but half idiot rustic, Corentino, whom he proposes to use as a tool, are brought together on the scene—is a marvel of characteristic quaintness and appropriate colour; but there is something deeper than mere local feeling in this subsidising of rural simplicity, and in the droll intertwining of Corentino's comic terror with all the tragedy of the central story. At every point of this opera there are touches of spiritual reality; and the poem is so subtle, and has attuned the composer's spirit to such fine issues, that it is often hardly possible to decide whether it is in the music, or the text, or in one's own imagination, inspired by both, that there lives a beauty far removed from the sensuous delight which opera ordinarily produces. It is in this key that Dinorah should always be represented and witnessed. Passing morceaux of great interest, there are dramatic combinations that in mere artistic skill deserve high praise; but it is in the sympathetic illumination of human nature by a quaint musical picture of peasant life in Brittany, intoxicated by a fanaticism of sin, relieved by droll episodes, and afterwards both darkened and cheered by the morale of a simple and childlike religion, that the great charm of the work lies.

On this occasion the opera was most fortunately represented. Mdlle. Ilma di Murska not only astonished and delighted the audience by her wonderful execution of the "Shadow Song" and other morceaux, but soared simply and easily to the full height of the mystic poetry of Dinorah's unconscious utterings of the warnings of religion at the moment when her lover is about to stretch out his hands to the sinister prize he has so desperately sought. Nor was this all. Her voice and execution delicately revealed every tendril of quaintness with which the composer has so curiously enriched his themes. Signor del Puente, as Hoel, showed himself possessed of the spirit of the legend; and his voice, moreover, told well in all the music; while Signor Cantoni, as Corentino, though not revealing more voice than on the other occasion on which he lately appeared, proved himself one of the best actors who ever stepped on the Italian stage. Anything like comic force in that domain is too apt to be mere buffoonery. Signor Cantoni's success, as the half-belated peasant, was much higher in character. Indeed, there was something almost worthy of Jefferson in the perfectly natural quality of his rustic humour. He sang like an artist, and hit the exact mean between superiority to comic vocal resource and a tricky dependence on mere antics of the voice.

The minor parts were successfully filled, Signor Agnesi being the hunter, Signor Rinaldini the reaper, Mdlle. Bauermeister and Mdlle. Justine Macvitz the goatherds. Rinaldini took his part quite au grand serieux, and made quite an impressive song of the reaper's scythe whetting ditty. Mdlle. Justine Macvitz (the male goatherd) appeared nervous, and is evidently unpractised on the stage, but her voice is clear, fresh and sweet, and her singing is in very good and simple taste. The orchestra was admirably handled by Signor Li Calsi, and the scenery, except a rather spasmodic and far from realistically-painted waterfall, was very good.

ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

This Society gave a fine performance of the Stabat Mater and Lobgesang on Wednesday evening, under the direction of Mr. Barnby. The Hall was again full in every part, and the Royal Box was again occupied by the Duke of Edinburgh and a distinguished party.

A marked advance appeared in the singing of the chorus throughout the evening, and no well-wisher of the Society need despair of soon seeing it brought up to the high standard attained by the choir of the late Oratorio Concerts. The soloists in the Lobgesang were Mdme. Otto Alvsleben, Miss Emily Spiller, and Mr. Cummings; in the Stabat Mater Mdme. Alvsleben, Mdme. Patey, Signor Bettini, and Signor Agnesi. The new German soprano acquitted herself admirably in both works, singing Mendelssohn quite as satisfactory as she sang Rossini, and doing entire justice to both. She was applauded with frequency and warmth. Mdme. Patey's work in the Stabat was done to perfection. Her delivery of Fac ut portem wanted absolutely nothing to make it all the most fastidious could desire. Mr. Cummings made a great success in "He counteth all your sorrows," and the great "Watchman" scena. This capital artist has been singing exceptionally well of late, and reaping a proportionate harvest of applause.

The share of Signor Bettini and Signor Agnesi in Rossini's well-known music was satisfactorily taken.

A better performance of the symphonic movements in the Lobgesang has not often been heard. Mr. Barnby conducted ably, and he very successfully resisted attempts to extort an encore. We congratulate him on both achievements.

THE LIVERPOOL PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA.

In justice to Mr. Charles Hallé, who has resided so long among us, and by his great artistic ability and gentlemanly conduct has attained so high a position in this country, we reprint the following letters, addressed the week before last to the editor of the Liverpool Daily Courier:—

THE PHILHARMONIC BAND.

Sir,—It will be remembered that at the last annual meeting of the Philharmonic Society, it was stated that Sir Julius Benedict had recommended that the society should give a series of six orchestral concerts, which would have the effect of improving the band, and, at the same time afford additional opportunities to the public of hearing good orchestral music. If I am not mistaken, it was gladly resolved that this suggestion should be carried out. Now, I am informed that, when the society began to make their arrangements for these extra concerts, a difficulty arose from a source whence it could least have been expected, and the difficulty was such that the whole scheme had to be abandoned, and the public are thus deprived of the benefit of the proposed concerts. It appears that about forty members of the Philharmonic band are also members of Mr. Hallé's Manchester band; and the report is that, when that gentleman heard of the intended concerts in Liverpool, he prohibited all in his band from taking engagements at those concerts, on pain of dismissal from his own orchestra. Perhaps some of your readers can inform me if this report is correct. If it is, should such monopoly be encouraged by the public? Yours respectfully, H.

Liverpool, March 17, 1873.

THE PHILHARMONIC BAND.

Sir,—Your correspondent "H." is wrongly informed as to our scheme of extra orchestral concerts in the autumn being abandoned.

The committee have been in negotiation with Mr. Hallé in reference to dates, not only of these concerts, but also of their Subscription Concerts, this course being necessary in order to avoid collision. These dates are now arranged, and should the extra concerts ultimately not be given, it is only just to Mr. Hallé to state that it will not be due to any action of his.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

Henry Sudlow, Secretary.

Orange Court, Liverpool, 18th March, 1873.

No one who knows Mr. Hallé can be ignorant of the high esteem in which he holds our illustrious half Englishman and entire musician, Sir Julius Benedict.

Geneva.—Herr A. Langert has taken, provisionally, the higher pianoforte classes at the Conservatory, in place of M. Bovy-Lysberg, deceased.

Elberfeld.—The series of Subscription Concerts was brought to a close by a highly successful performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah, under the direction of Herr Hermann Schornstein. The vocal solos were entrusted to Mesdes. Wüerst, Boos, Herr Eugen Gura, and Dr. Gunz. Herr Knappe presided with masterly effect at the organ.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

"From the sublime to the ridiculous"—or, perhaps, I might put it more aptly—"from the sublime to the grotesque." After Hamlet, on Thursday last, Geneviève de Brabant was given on Saturday. The former went well, as usual, owing to the careful singing and capital voice of M. Fronty, and the excellent Ophelia of Madame Depoitiers, the acting and singing of which part she has studied with evident care.

How shall I descend to Geneviève? I presume—as I see it advertised as being played in London—it can hardly be in the same garb as it was here on Saturday night. An enormous audience applauded and laughed at the new and really pretty mise-en-scène, the costumes, the light music of M. Offenbach (which reminded one especially of Orphée aux Enfers), and the capital acting and singing of the large troupe of artists, who, evidently not playing it for the first time, threw themselves into the whole "affair" with gusto. But now and then, even among so many French—for there were few English present who understood all the words (especially of the songs), though they might much of the action of the piece—there was a hiss, and justly so, at some of the situations, and, at last, at the moral of the opera. It "drew," however, and I suppose that is all right for the management; and management in the person of M. Clement desires, and, I am sure, deserves a good house on every occasion, for there is always a good "bill of fare." I for one, however, would suggest to him not to provoke cries of "Oh!" and bring blushes to the cheeks of the fair part of his audience, else would the latter have to put on an extra quantity of powder, which would be "very awful."

The part of the heroine was taken by Mdlle. Noaille who looked, acted, and sang to perfection. Her quiet, lady-like demeanour seemed almost out of character with the piece. M. Bourard, as the Duc la Curacao, was in his element, and sang better than I have heard him hitherto. Mdlle. Faigle, as the page, came out well. M. Hererwyn, as Golos, in his grotesque acting and costume, was perfect. In fact this performance of Geneviève only proves how well fitted M. Clement's troupe is for opera comique, and that the more we have of it at certain seasons of the year the better it might be prolonged.

Il Trovatore, on Sunday, attracted the usual crowd of Boulognaise, but its performance I did not witness. On Tuesday, for the last time, Dr. Crispin—better performed than ever. Our season is drawing to a close; after Sunday we observe Passion week, then one more week of opera et voila, tout c'est fini till July 15, when, I am happy to inform you, M. Clement Martin returns here both as manager of the Theatre and conductor at the Etablissement des Bains, he having signed with the Conseil Municipale to that effect a few days ago. A brilliant season is expected, and I am glad we are to have the "right man in the right place."

VIENNA.—The Slavonish Choral Society, "Beseda," gave an interesting concert last week in the "Flower Saloons," before a numerous and elegant audience. The Slavonish national songs, arranged as choruses by Professor Förchtgott, who conducted them in a masterly manner, were immensely successful, also the "Kovarschka," von Novacek, and a festival chorus from Bendell's opera, Bretislau. Fraulein M. Halka played several compositions of Chopin's with poetical expression, displaying a beautiful touch and excellent method. Herr K. Jirmus played an interesting and brilliant Concertino for the harp, by C. Oberthür, with so much success that he was three times recalled. Fraulein Helene and Natalie Lachner, two charming and very talented young artists, gave Kalliwoda's Rondo Concertante, and met with an enthusiastic reception. The concert gave great satisfaction, and Professor Förchtgott must have been gratified to find his efforts for the cultivation of Slavonish music so well appreciated.

MILAN.—Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin was produced at the Scala, on the 20th March, and proved anything but a success. The second performance went off even worse than the first. The receipts, too, on the second night were much less than those on the first. The Trovatore of the 23rd March says: "The battle at the Scala is not yet terminated, though, we think, decided. On the first night, the struggle between applause and disapprobation occurred only at rare intervals; during the rest of the evening the performance passed off amid yawns, silence, and hisses, while a feeling of mortal wearisomeness reigned supreme." The principal parts were sustained by Madame Krauss, Mdlle. Edelsberg, Signori Campanini and Maurel.

MUSIC IN MELBOURNE.

The great activity which for many months past has characterised our musical circles has at length subsided, and left us with little of current interest to record.

On Saturday, the 4th January, was given the last of the Intercolonial Festival Concerts, the first having taken place on the 26th December. There was a fair attendance, and the performance was good. These entertainments resulted in loss to the projectors, and a number of the artists engaged throughout the festival volunteered their services for a benefit performance in favour of "Mr. Coppin and his financial associates." This event took place at the Town-hall on Saturday, the 11th January. The result was not so good as had been anticipated. The cantata, entitled Prōi, or at the Dawning, composed by Signor Giorza expressly for performance at these festival concerts—the words being written by Mr. Marcus Clarke—formed the first part of the entertainment, and was well rendered. After this Mr. Coppin addressed the audience in explanation of the want of success that had attended the Musical Festival, which he attributed chiefly to the efforts of the Royal Commissioners of the Exhibition to render it attractive to the public. A handsome chromolithographic tablet designed by Mr. John Hennings, the well-known scenic artist at the Theatre Royal, was then presented by Mr. Coppin to all the members of the chorus as a memento of the first Intercolonial Musical Festival ever held in Australia. Two new musical societies date their existence from the time of the festival chorus of 1872-3 being brought together. They are called the Melbourne Musical Union and the Victorian Musical Society, the first being under the direction of Signor Giorza and Mr. W. R. Furlong, and the latter following the lead of Herr Siede and Mr. Perraton. At this concert Mr. T. H. Guenett, a pupil of Charles Hallé, made a favourable impression as an organist. At the Exhibition there has been an uninterrupted succession of miscellaneous music from the 6th of November until the 18th of January (both days inclusive). During the last days that the place remained open it was visited by great crowds of people, the Commissioners having reduced the price of admission to 6d. There has been all the variety in the music presented at this place which could be found between the enthusiastic brayings of the volunteer brass band and the well-tempered harmonies of the professional orchestra. During the period above-named the Exhibition was visited by 149,876 persons.

A recent annual meeting of the Melbourne Philharmonic Society showed the affairs of that body to be in a very flourishing condition. After presenting a douceur of £50 to Mr. David Lee, the honorary conductor, to whom the society is largely indebted for its success, the accounts showed assets of over £718, no liabilities, and a creditor cash balance of over £202 at bank. Mr. J. D. Pinnock was elected president, Mr. D. Lee hon. conductor, and Mr. Pitts (succeeding Mr. R. B. Caunter) hon. secretary. The society is now rehearsing Costa's Naaman, and amongst other works new to this place will give, during the ensuing season, Barnett's Ancient Mariner, Sullivan's Prodigal Son, The Crown of Thorns, by Charles Packer, of Sydney, and a cantata entitled Adoration, the composition of Mr. Austin Turner, of Ballarat. Mrs. J. H. Fox and Mr. H. Hallam are singing with the Rickards company at the New Apollo Hall.

On the 18th inst. there was given a very agreeable open-air entertainment in the Botanical Gardens for the benefit of the Children's Hospital. Another is advertised for the first of February, and the committee have it in contemplation to organise an evening performance on a grand scale in the same place, and for the same purpose, in about a fortnight after that.

The Kennedy family of Scottish vocalists are making a successful tour of the Western district. The Carandini company have gone to New Zealand, and all those who came to assist at the recent Musical Festival have returned to the places they represented.

The City Council of Melbourne have decided upon not making any appointment to the office of city organist.

The Melbourne German Liedertafel gives its periodical entertainments with customary success.

INNSBRUCK.—The members of the Musical Union will give a two days' Musical Festival this year, the days selected being the 25th and 26th June. On the first day Mendelssohn's oratorio of Elijah will be performed, the principal parts being sustained by Mesdames Sophie Förster, Sophie Diez (from the Royal Opera, Munich), Herren Ferdinand Bohling, and Julius Stockhausen. The second day will be devoted to a miscellaneous concert.—At the second concert of the same Society, the programme included Herr M. Nageller's Symphony in C minor, already given with marked success in Munich, Cologne, Paris, and elsewhere. The composer was called on several times at the conclusion of his work.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 5, 1873.

HERR RICHARD WAGNER, so the story goes, declines to come among us, unless ——. We are not surprised, because, after all, Herr Richard Wagner is a man. We do not mean to say that he is not more than a man—that he has not in him the element of the Divine which belongs to all Prophets and Men of Genius. He has prophesied long, he has gained the ear of the world, and he has followers who look up to him with reverential awe. But after all, we repeat, Herr Wagner is a man. He cannot, therefore, have much love for the island which is probably not regarded by him as the Ultima Thule of art. Remembrances of 1864 crowd upon him when the name of England is pronounced. He recollects how the cry was wafted to him from distressed Philharmonic directors, —"Come over and help us," and how, like another St. Patrick, bent upon driving out vermin, he landed upon our shores. As it proved, the vermin were too strong for the missionary. They worried him, stung him all over a delicate epidermis, and never permitted him to rest till a hasty retreat placed the Channel between the assailants and their victim. These are the real facts of the case. At all events, Herr Wagner, and his love for England may be imagined. When, therefore, it was reported that the Prophet would visit our country again, wise men shook their heads doubtingly. We are now told, in justification of their doubts, that Herr Wagner will not come, unless——. Unless what? Unless his old enemies be gagged, and delivered into his hands? unless Parliament vote money to build a Wagnerian theatre? unless a knighthood be conferred on Herr Dannreuther? unless Mr. J. V. Bridgeman's translation of Opera und Drama be made an English text-book in all Government schools? unless Messrs. Gye and Mapleson do penance at Charing Cross, dressed as Lohengrin and Tannhäuser? unless Mr. George Wood have a statue erected in his honour, as he appeared when contemplating the Flying Dutchman from the wings at Drury Lane?—No, for none of these things does Herr Wagner stipulate. He wants a thousand guineas, sterling coin of the realm, and good weight at the Bank. Like Cheap Jack, between whom and Herr Wagner there is an affinity, the result of common relations with "Brummagem"—like Cheap Jack, he asks no more, but is determined to take no less. Going—no, coming—for a thousand guineas, sterling coin, as aforesaid. Will anybody bid? Remember that a Prophet is a rara avis in terris. The wild beast dealers in the East of London think nothing of spending an equal sum on a good, healthy, and full-grown hippopotamus. Surely Herr Wagner is of more value than many hippopotami. Weigh the matter, then, ye men with money, and see if the thousand guineas cannot be raised. Such a chance may never occur again, because the apotheosis at Bayreuth is near at hand. Coming for a thousand guineas! Be in time; be in time!

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

In the "London letter" addressed to an important North England Journal, the correspondent speaks as follows of the new book entitled "Another World," from the pages of which we have so frequently quoted, and which has already obtained a notoriety almost unexampled in recent times:—

"I have just seen the preface to a new edition of the remarkable book which, under the name of 'Another World,' has recently attracted so much attention. The author, still keeping his nom de plume, 'Hermes,' begins by disclaiming the credit of having invented 'Montalluyah.' While flattered by the compliment paid to him, he is willing to 'await a time, perhaps not far distant, when credence will be given to his assertion that the Fragments have their source not in his imagination but in another planet.' After this the public will be more curious than ever to know by what means the Ruler of Montalluyah and Hermes were first brought into communication. The editor also sets right some of his critics by stating that 'Another World' was in manuscript ten years prior to the publication of Lord Lytton's Coming Race, so that the former could not have been suggested by the latter. Not only so, but the MS. was submitted to 'one of the most illustrious rulers of Europe, now defunct,' long before the Coming Race appeared, with a view to 'the great good that might result from the training of 'Character Divers' in the art of detecting and curing incipient faults of the young. There is much other matter in the preface of an interesting sort; and, whether the book itself be regarded as a fiction, or taken, on the testimony of the author, as dealing with fact, no doubt can be entertained that it shrewdly handles various questions of interest on our own planet, and that no one can read it without picking up valuable ideas. Hermes may rest assured that all who make the acquaintance of his work will want to know more and more of the fortunate dwellers in the Star City."

We can conscientiously add that the more Another World is attentively read, the more it will invite serious reflection. We are not all precisely as we seem to be.

A PARAGRAPH in another part of this impression gives particulars of the remarkable series of concerts to take place next week at the Royal Albert Hall. We mention the subject here in order that due acknowledgment might be made of the enterprise which is involved in the scheme, and the admirable artistic results which might flow therefrom. The chorale singing of the audience will be a peculiar feature and deserves attention, as an absolutely new thing under the sun. There is no reason why the Passion should not be given in a concert-room just as in a church; and our hope is that the result of the experiment will prove all that its promoters desire. Friday, we observe, is a blank-day, and we should like to know the reason why. Surely on the very anniversary of the Crucifixion, the Passion might be recited with advantage and propriety. We have no patience with the religious prudery which draws such fine distinctions as are here involved.

SCHWERIN.—At the wish of the Grand-Duke, the Musical Festival to be given here this year will take place the week before Whitsuntide. Besides the Vocal Union of this town itself, the Vocal Unions of Rostock, Wismar, Güstrow, and other towns will take part in the proceedings. Herr Alois Schmidt has been appointed conductor.

VENICE.—Very great dissatisfaction has been caused by the fact that the world-renowned Teatro Fenice has remained closed all this season, and this dissatisfaction has increased in consequence of the probability of the theatre being closed next season also. At a recent meeting of the proprietors, the latter resolved that the theatre should not be opened if the Municipal Authorities still persisted in their refusal to vote a sufficient subvention.

THE COMPASS AND ANCHOR IN MONTALLUYAH.

The compass used in our ships is different to yours, being based on the fact that each country has a different attraction to certain liquids. In short, we apply an electrical power entirely unknown to you. The anchor is made of iron-marble, the strongest composition we have, and used in the construction of the Mountain Supporter. In shape the anchor resembles a body with six legs like a fly—three on either side. Each leg has a crook at the end, which will grapple firmly wherever the least hold can be obtained.—"Another World."

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

MISS EMMA BUSBY gave a well-atttended morning concert in Hanover Square Rooms, on March 28th. She was assisted by Mdme. Otto Alvsleben—who made a great success in arias by Mozart and Weber—Herr STRAUS, Signor Pezze, and M. Tellefsen. The interest of the occasion, however, chiefly attached to Miss Busby's own doings, which were of a most successful character. Among the works played by the talented pianist were Beethoven's Trio in G major (with MM. Straus and Pezze), Chopin's Ballade in G minor and Posthumous Rondo for two pianos (with M. Tellefsen), Schumann's Sonata in A minor for piano and violin (Herr Straus), and one or two smaller pieces. All these things amounted to a heavy morning's work, and exacted no small degree of ability. Miss Busby may be fairly congratulated on successfully accomplishing the task, and, at the same time, asserting, once again, the talent with which she is endowed.

A CONCERT took place at the Hall, Crouch End, on Monday evening, March 31, and proved successful. Miss F. Wake played the overture to Zampa, Mr. Sugden sang "The Skipper," Mr. Williams gave a song by Mattach, "Only" was gracefully sung by Miss F. Martin, and Mr. C. J. Bishenden gave "Hearts of Oak" (by desire), "The Wolf" and "The Friar of Orders Grey," and obtained an encore for each. The proceeds were announced to be given to a local charitable institution.

MDLLE. ANNETTE KUHN gave a concert at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Saturday evening last, and much interest was manifested during her performances, owing to the sad affliction under which she suffers (blindness). Mdlle. Kuhn plays upon an instrument not greatly affected in this country, (the zither), and plays upon it in so artistic a manner that the inferiority of her instrument is forgotten in the charm of her performance. On the occasion under notice Mdlle. Kuhn gave M. Buchecher's "Souvenir de la Suisse," in the first part of the programme, and in the second a "Concerto," a "Divertissement," and a "Morceau de Salon" by the same composer. In each of these the fair and interesting young artist exhibited qualities of the highest order, and the applause and recalls awarded were justly her due. The vocalist who assisted at the concert was Mdme. Florence Lancia, whose facile execution and excellent method of singing were exhibited to advantage in arrangements of Chopin's mazurkas (originally written for the pianoforte), "L'Oiselot" and "Aime Moi," as well as in a charmingly quaint song by Mdme. Sainton-Dolby, entitled, "G. L. O. V. E." The instrumentalists were Herr Schloesser, Herr Wiener and M. Paque, who played Schumann's Trio in F (pianoforte, violin and violoncello), in a thoroughly artistic style. M. Paque also gave a solo on the violoncello in so attractive a manner that he was compelled to return and bow his acknowledgments of the warm plaudits justly accorded to him. Miss Mayfield also sang some songs in a pleasing manner and was capitally accompanied on the pianoforte by Signor Vizetti. Herr Schloesser accompanied Mdlle. Kuhn in her solos, and the concert afforded general satisfaction.

HERR CARL DEICHMANN, whom it is superfluous to describe as one of our very best resident musicians, gave a most interesting concert at the Hanover Square Rooms on Tuesday last. Following the example of Mr. Bache, Herr Deichmann engaged a complete orchestra, chiefly from the Crystal Palace, under the direction of Mr. Manns; and, still following Mr. Bache, he presented abundance of novelty to his patrons, who, we are glad to say, attended in considerable numbers and in an appreciative mood. The programme opened with Bach's Suite in D—the only work of the kind by that master which has come down to us. Its merits are known, and the reader will assume the extent to which the quaint dance movements—Gavotte, Bourrée, and Gigue—pleased everybody who heard them. In Mozart's Concerto in E flat, for violin and orchestra, Herr Deichmann had a capital opportunity of displaying his skill as a soloist, and turned it to the best possible use. His able performance excited unanimous applause, and a warm recall. The bénéficiaire appeared as a composer to no less advantage than as an executant. His MS. overture in E minor, Solitude, is a clever and suggestive work, showing not less of imaginative power than command of artistic resources. Merit was also apparent in two songs, and in a Concertstück for violin and orchestra—an elaborate work which deserves another and a speedy hearing. Beethoven's glorious Leonora overture ended a concert of the most enjoyable kind. The vocalists were Madame Tellefsen and Herr Elmenhorst, each of whom seemed to gratify the audience.

THE Sacred Harmonic Society has announced its forty-first annual Passion-week performance of Handel's Messiah for Wednesday week, the 9th April. The principal vocalists will be Miss Edith Wynne, Madame Patey, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr Santley; Mr. Harper as solo trumpet, and the band and chorus consisting of the usual 700 performers, conducted by Sir Michael Costa.

PROVINCIAL.

CLITHEROE.—The Preston Herald informs us that on Monday, March 22nd, the Clitheroe Choral Society gave their first concert, and adds:—

"Besides forty or fifty voices, the society has an almost complete orchestra—six violins, two violas, three violoncellos, two double basses, two flutes, two oboes, clarionet, bassoon, two cornets, two horns, tenor and bass trombones, and drums. Mendelssohn's St Paul had been for some time in rehearsal, but owing to the necessity for holding the concert before the great choral difficulties of this work could be overcome, a selection from the oratorio was given, and miscellaneous pieces added to make up the programme. The overtures to Die Zauberflöte and Der Freischütz went well; the spirited leadership of Mr. C. A. Seymour, the playing of Mr. Lazarus as principal clarionet, and the vigorous conducting of Mr. Forrest, contributing much to the result. The choruses were also well done. Mr. Seymour played a brilliant solo, and was encored. Mr. Lazarus, always skilful in execution and refined in style, played with Mr. Forrest a Duo Concertante by Weber, and a solo on airs from Der Freischütz, to perfection. Mr. Marsden, a native flautist, played so well that he suffered little by comparison with the professionals. To the 'lady amateur,' who, under the careful training of Madame Enderson, has acquired vocal skill sufficient to enable her to sing well 'With verdure clad,' and 'Lo, here the gentle lark' (enthusiastically encored), the society is under great obligation for her most valuable services. A prominent feature of the concert was the first performance of a cantata by Mr. Angelo Forrest, written by him as part of the examination for a musical degree at Oxford. It was much enjoyed by the audience, and to the musicians present showed such skill and scholarship as need only cultivation and experience to enable Mr. Forrest to take a good stand among English composers. It was interesting also as the first performance by a Clitheroe chorus and orchestra of a choral work composed by a native of our town.

MELTON MOWBRAY.—A concert was given in the Corn Exchange, under the patronage of the Earl of Wilton and the officers of the Rifle Corps, by Mr. Nicholson of Leicester, Madame Thaddeus Wells, and the Rifle Corps Band. There was a very good attendance, and the efforts of the performers gave great satisfaction. The singing of Madame Thaddeus Wells, and the playing on the flute of Mr. Nicholson, produced great applause, and secured several encores.

LEICESTER.—Mr. Nicholson gave a concert in the Temperance Hall on Thursday evening, March 25th, the performers being Mr. Charles Hallé, Madame Norman-Néruda, Madame Thaddeus Wells, Mr. Nicholson, and the chorus of the New Philharmonic Society. The audience was as highly appreciative as it was large and fashionable, and the lovers of high-class music had a treat of no common order. Mr. Hallé was in his best form, and evoked frequent and well-deserved plaudits. Each of his solos was loudly encored. Instead of repeating the last, however, he gave Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith." Madame Néruda, by her exquisite execution in each instance, won golden opinions. Madame Wells and Mr. Nicholson contributed in no slight degree to the success of the concert.

EDINBURGH.—The Daily Review of March 31 informs us that:—

"Professor Oakeley gave another organ recital on Saturday afternoon, in the class-room, Park Place, to a large audience. The programme (which we give below) was headed "University Concert Echoes," the majority of the selections given on Saturday having been performed at the University Amateur Concert, in the Music Hall, on the 24th inst.—Overture—'Occasional,' (a) Andante maestoso, (b) Allegro fugato, (c) Adagio, (d) March, Handel; part-song, Onward roaming, Muller; Andante (for organ), Lefebure-Wely; Poco Adagio, Menuetto e Trio, Symphony in C, No. 6, Mozart; part-songs—(a) Hunting song, (b) Love's philosophy, H. S. Oakeley; Andante Grazioso (for organ), H. Smart; Thuringian Volkslied, F. Abt; Gavotte in D, Violoncello Sonata, No. 6, Bach; March, Cornelius, Mendelssohn. The Professor exhibited his command over the resources of his instrument, more especially in the various movements of Handel's "Occasional Overture," and in Mendelssohn's Cornelius march, in which the ideas of the composers were brought out with wonderful delicacy and distinctness. Very tender, too, was the rendering of the Gavotte in D from Bach's sixth violoncello sonata."

SEVILLE.—Political events do not appear to interfere much with artistic matters here. There is to be an Italian Opera this season, just as though nothing unusual had occurred, Madame Sass and Signora Volpini being mentioned among the artists already engaged.

BRUNN.—The members of the Musical Union have just given a performance of a new work, Hero und Leander, founded upon the well-known old Greek legend, by Herr Georg Vierling. The concert commenced with Beethoven's Symphony in C major, Op. 21, and Mdlle. Marie Fillunger sang an air from Mendelssohn's Elijah, in addition to the soprano solos in Hero und Leander.

HERR PAUER'S LECTURES.

Herr Pauer's three lectures on the History of Oratorio were conspicuous in the scheme of the Sacred Harmonic Society's forty-first season, and were generally recognised as a step in the right direction. The progress and development of musical art is a subject about which the average amateur knows little. He is, as a rule, content to take things as he finds them, and leaves to others the work of investigating causative processes. But the great society which, for nearly half a century, has upheld oratorio among us recognises the fact that its duty is to anticipate public needs, and Herr Pauer now comes forward as its appointed teacher. As a lecturer to an English audience he may labour under disadvantages which no care on his part can remove; but he undoubtedly brings to his work great earnestness and an adequate knowledge of the subject. After all, a musical lecture depends only in a secondary degree upon the oratorical ability of the lecturer. If he select his materials with judgment, and marshall his facts with clearness, the illustrations will do all the rest sufficiently well. So far, Herr Pauer meets the demands of his position in Exeter Hall, and to "sit under" his teaching is to be both entertained and instructed. The first lecture, given last week, was chiefly taken up with a sketch of the origin of oratorio, from the songs of pilgrims and palmers to the Miracle Plays, and finally to the cantatas, admirably represented by the Jonah and Jephtha of Carissimi. On Wednesday week Herr Pauer finished his survey of the development of oratorio in Italy, noticing, en passant, the works of Stradella and Scarlatti, from whose music, notably from John the Baptist, by the older master, some very interesting selections were given. Turning next to Germany the lecturer described the Passion music as an importation from Italy, and sketched the circumstances under which it took root and flourished. Considerable attention, was, of course, given to the chorale, and the fact of Martin Luther's shrewd discernment of the religious use to which popular melodies might be put obtained due prominence. This was unquestionably, the most interesting part of Herr Pauer's lecture, thanks to some well-chosen examples. Two secular tunes by Heinrich Isaac (1539), and one other by Haslar (1601), were first given in their original shape, and afterwards sung as chorales, according to the form, with some slight changes, in which they have come down to us. Herr Pauer next dwelt upon the genius and works of Heinrich Schütz, whom he described as the "father of German music." A long selection from the Matthew Passion of this undoubtedly great composer more than justified the praises of the lecturer, and made a lively impression upon the audience. Herr Pauer expressed a hope that some society would take up the works of Schütz and do justice to one of the most useful pioneers of art. We are disposed to believe, looking at the simple grandeur of the passages chosen from his greatest work, that most of the audience shared that hope. The very interesting notice of Schütz was followed by a sketch of the circumstances under which variations of, and departures from, the Bible text came into vogue at Hamburg, and so established the outline of oratorio as it is now known. Selections from the Passion of Reinhard Keiser admirably illustrated the points touched upon by the lecturer, and brought this division of his labours to an effective end. Miss Banks, Mrs. Sidney Smith, Miss Marion Severn, Mr. Montem Smith and Mr. Distin did good service as soloists, Miss Banks being encored in Scarlatti's air, "Il mio figlio." The choral pieces were sung by a portion of the society's chorus, under the direction of Mr. Smythson, and Mr. Willing efficiently presided at the organ.

A SERIES of special sacred performances will be given during Passion week at the Royal Albert Hall, under the direction of Mr. Barnby. These will commence on Monday evening the 7th inst., with Bach's sacred oratorio, the Passion (St. Matthew), which will be repeated on the three succeeding days, the series terminating on Saturday evening the 12th inst., with a performance of Handel's Messiah. The solo vocalists will be Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Otto Alvsleben, Madame Patey, Miss Dones, Messrs. Cummings, Edward Lloyd, Thurley Beale, and Signor Foli; and Mr. Sims Reeves has been engaged for the performance of the Messiah. A special feature, and one that will claim universal attention, will be a request addressed to the audience to rise and join in the Chorales of the Passion music, to facilitate which, an arrangement has been made to provide books of words containing the melodies of the Chorales, which will be supplied at a nominal charge.

FLORENCE.—A new ballet, Idea, has been produced with complete success at the Pergola.—At the Pagliano, M. Gueymard, in Le Prophète, has been far from gaining "troops of friends." On the contrary, nearly everyone accuses him of having caused the failure of the opera by his unsatisfactory rendering of the principal part.

LOHENGRIN AT THE SCALA.*

The first question of all will be: What was the result? Heaven forbid that I should begin with a harsh word; let the reader judge for himself.

The Prelude was warmly applauded; knowing how long a distance had to be traversed before reaching another really beautiful number, some few well-intentioned persons wanted an encore, but the majority protested, and the opera went on. Glacial silence at the terribly long scene in which Telramund accuses Elsa, at the arrival of Elsa, and all the following scene, till the appearance of the Swan, when there was again loud applause; then coldness and signs of disapprobation at the interminable duet between Elsa and Lohengrin, and the summons of the Herald, up to the Quintet, which was applauded. Marks of disapprobation at the Finale. With the exception of a very short chorus, which was applauded, the second act began, continued and finished, in the midst of marks of disapprobation and hisses. In the third act, the Prelude was applauded; the nuptial hymn received in silence; audience remained cold during the love-duet, though one or two phrases pleased; disapprobation with a reaction of applause at the entry of the standard-bearers; hearty applause at Lohengrin's long song; applause mingled with disapprobation at the Finale†. For any one judging by the data up to the other day, the opera was a failure; for the Wagnerites, it is not; their religion is so severe and so harsh; they themselves are so accustomed to abstinence, that if they only break their fast they fancy they have been indulging in a feast. After the second act, the most fanatical agreed in saying that the fall was a heavy one. After the third the same individuals retracted their words, and ran off to write in the reports for their journals: "The success was disputed, and the evening a stormy one, but the vessel arrived safely in port."

This is the ordinary artifice, which up to yesterday kept their colossus on his feet; and thus, for all who were not able to look at him closely, Wagner will continue to be a genius, a haughty god, who despises the adoration of the crowd, and has his glories sung only by the Elect.

In this there is danger for our young composers, who will still remain in uncertainty. But this is not the danger to be most feared; the real danger—and I speak with a profound conviction of the truth of my words—would have been caused by the approbation of the public; that approbation was not awarded, which is enough; the danger is past. As for the fiddle-faddle of us critics, let us be frank; it is never worth more than what it costs. We have all a certain rhetorical and grammatical stock-in-trade, and a certain practical acquaintance with the stage; some of us know how to put four bars together; and others know only how to strum them on the piano, while some do not know even this; our larger or smaller amount of knowledge enables us to make some display of technical acquirements, or some historical quotation, but all of us indiscriminately judge, at any rate, with the good sense and good taste which we believe we possess; yet we cannot boast of ever having rectified the opinion of anyone.

I learnt the libretto by heart, so that my attention might not be distracted at the grand rehearsal. I ensconced myself in an arm-chair, and, in my effort to be attentive, left nothing of myself alive save my ears and my heart. I should have shut my eyes had I not been afraid of going to sleep. I attended the first performance, and I followed the opera religiously the whole evening; I went to the second, and did not utter a word of lamentation. I knew that every imitation is accompanied by terrible ordeals, and, like a good neophyte, I was firm; but to-day, at length, if it seems to you time that the bandage should be removed, and that I should behold the true light, I ask permission to proclaim aloud my impressions, which I sum up in one—overwhelming and never-to-be-forgotten—the impression of wearisomeness. I will confess a sin. I allowed myself to be seduced by my amour propre. I had the weakness after the rehearsal to think the little really beautiful was beautiful; and as such it struck me afterwards, sometimes, despite the opinion of the public (as, for instance, the nuptial chorus in the third act,); but, during all the rest of the opera I experienced nothing but wearisomeness, more profound at the second performance than at the first, and more profound at the third than at the second.

I renounce the task of analyzing the pathological sense of fatigue, and of examining Lohengrin in detail; this has already been effectively done in the columns of the Gazetta. It appears to me more necessary to ascend from the variety, Lohengrin, to the species, Wagner, and to judge, if possible, the revolutionary system of this innovator. But this is not possible, first of all because the author of Lohengrin has repented having made in that work too many concessions to the old manner, and then because, in order to judge a work completely, one must see it in its integrity, and we did not do so in the present instance. The excisions made at one time or the other to render the work worthy of the sympathy of an Italian public exceed at present a thousand bars, that is to say, about a third of the opera.* It is not a good excuse to say that these thousand bars of recitative are wearisome and insupportable; it is the public who should say things of this sort, and the cuts should be made after the public has spoken; to anticipate the cuts is to condemn a work before it has appeared before the tribunal of the public. It is certain that when Wagner wrote the thousand bars, he did not wish them to remain unknown, and so true is this that, to lodge them appropriately, he is having a theatre built on purpose at Bayreuth.

However, we do not complain very much; if a thousand wearisome bars were omitted, another thousand, and still another, remain; these cannot certainly give us a precise idea of the amount of penance with which the austere reformer would have a few fleeting moments of pleasure purchased, but they suffice, and more than suffice, to make us understand the absurdity of his system.

I say nothing of Wagner the librettist; it would be unjust to judge him by the mutilated bit of a book given to the public, so that the latter might not perceive the cuts affected in the music. It is possible that, in the original, certain improbabilities do not exist, and that there is a reason for certain scenes which now appear inexplicable; still the story will always remain as it is now, without true passion, without strong situations, without plot, and without interest. The supernatural instead of the dramatic; choreographic instead of scenic movement. Nothing can prevent Elsa from being an inspired visionary, who believes in dreams, and allows herself to be tricked, first by Ortruda, and then by Telramund—in that to such a degree as to consent that the latter shall come in the night to cut off the end of one of her husband's fingers; nothing can prevent Ortruda from being an incomprehensible witch, or Telramund a grand puppet, full of wind. What can we think of an innovator in the musical drama who commences his reforms by carrying us back, with his choice of subjects, to the performances at the Courts of the Middle Ages, and to mythology, which is the infancy of human thought. Wagner does not give us strong passions to be heightened by musical colouring, or situations which threaten to overpower the composer. The absurdity at the bottom of the libretto allows him to overwhelm us with a mystic kind of music, in the oratorio style, indefinite, vapoury, unsubstantial, without outline, without beginning and without end, and thus to boast of having fitted the music to the words.

(To be continued.)

MADRID.—Señor Monasterio lately announced that he and his orchestra would resume their Sunday Concerts at the Circo, being convinced that the music-loving public would attend, despite the political troubles at present agitating the Spanish capital. It is Señor Monasterio's purpose to introduce to his patrons specimens of old and new compositions in every department of musical art. Among his earliest novelties are mentioned Gounod's E flat major Symphony; Beethoven's Kreutzer Duet-Sonata (arranged for the piano); Wallace's overture to Maritana; and Abert's to Astorga; the music by Taubert to The Tempest, &c. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Seventh Symphony, and Sinfonia Eroica, are to be performed several times in the course of the concerts.—Signor Stagno took his benefit on the 8th March, in the opera of Robert le Diable. Madame Sass was the Alice; Madame Fetè-Goula, the Isabella.

* From the Gazetta Musicale di Milano.

† This applies to the first night; on the second, the wearisomeness was more apparent and the impatience greater, while the signs of disapprobation were more frequent.

* The sum total of bars excised before the first performance amounted to 1061, say: one thousand and sixty-one, and it was necessary to cut out still more at the second.

EXHIBITION MUSIC.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. having made the necessary arrangements with Her Majesty's Commissioners, state that—

1. With a view to an adequate exposition of the art of music, and generally to its advancement in this country, daily orchestral concerts will be given in the Royal Albert Hall during the period of the Exhibition, i.e., from 14th April to 31st October, inclusive. The orchestra will consist of at least fifty performers, chosen with special care from the best available sources, and including some of the most esteemed London professors, as well as instrumentalists of high repute from the provinces and abroad.

2. The performances will be limited to music of a high class. As a rule, each programme will contain a symphony or concerto, two overtures, and a selection of solo vocal music. It is proposed to vary this order on Wednesdays by means of recitals of operas, and other works exceptional in their interest. The production of music unknown or unfamiliar in England, will be kept steadily in view.

3. The programmes will include examples of all schools of orchestral music which may fairly claim to be considered classical. The works of acknowledged great masters, from Sebastian Bach to Schumann, will, of course, be largely drawn upon; due attention being also paid to living composers—Gade, Brahms, Liszt, Wagner, W. S. Bennett, &c.

4. With a special view to the encouragement of musical composition in this country, prominence will be given to the works of English composers. The words already sent in at the invitation of Her Majesty's Commissioners, and those which may hereafter be submitted for examination, will, if found worthy, be publicly performed.

5. Advantage will be taken of these concerts to bring forward young English artists, both vocal and instrumental, whose ability may entitle them to the privilege of a public appearance.

6. In order to make the concerts as educational in their results as possible, each programme will contain historical and analytical details of the works to be performed, accompanied by illustrations in music type. The preparation of these annotated programmes has been entrusted to Mr. Joseph Bennett.

7. All the concerts will be conducted by Mr. Barnby.

8. In addition to the orchestral and choral performances, daily recitals will be given upon the grand organ in the Royal Albert Hall by Mr. Best, organist of St. George's Hall, Liverpool, and by Dr. Stainer, organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. The organ will also be used, with the orchestra, in the performance of Handel's concertos, and works of a similar character.

"ANOTHER WORLD."

The extraordinary and wide-spread sensation created by the book which bears the above title warrants us in reproducing any criticism, sceptical or the contrary, which it may have called forth. Here is a criticism from the Sunday Times:—

"Works describing life in strange regions, or, it may be, in other worlds, have been a constant result of the tendency to speculation, inherent in the minds of able men. They have been serious, philosophical, comical, and political in turns, and have provided a favourite means for the learned of expounding, under the guise of story, their views as to the amelioration of the human species. A very wide class of books is that which deals with imaginary empires. Sometimes, as in the case of Bacon and Sir Thomas More, the writer places his Atlantis or his Utopia in some undiscovered portion of the globe; sometimes, as in Swift's immortal satire, he changes his district at will; again, with the great French soldier, Cyrano de Bergerac, he mounts and explores the moon or the sun; and once again, like Peter Wilkins, he invents a land and beings of absolute fantasy. The author or editor of 'Another World,' the strange book before us, has chosen to describe life in a planet existing under conditions tolerably similar to those we ourselves experience. The planet Mars is singled out as that from which the description is probably taken, our author, with amusing cleverness, persisting in the pretence that the experiences he gives are actual, and that the whole is to be received with implicit faith by the reader. Exceedingly amusing is the warmth of the editor's appeal to his readers to suspend their judgment as to the truth of the revelations until he has judged of their political value. The editor himself opines that 'an unpractical student will find it easier to believe in their planetary origin than in their emanating from an ordinary human brain.' We cannot say that we are of his opinion. The life described by the writer is a mere carrying out of that with which we are familiar in this world, and very little exercise of fancy or speculation is necessary to develop all that is assigned to 'The Star City of Montallnyah' from what is observed in London. It is true that observations of this kind are anticipated in the introduction, in which it is frankly admitted that both the world described and its inhabitants bear a close resemblance to our own. Much ingenuity is shown in the manner in which the supposed revelations are communicated. The narrator is a certain man of kingly birth, who, by his habits, becomes Tootmanyoso, or supreme ruler. In the guise of an autobiography, he gives a description of the world over which he rules, and of its conditions of life, political, social, physical, religious, and what not. The social aspects are the most amusing, though those which deal with educational influences and the like are clearly those by which the author sets most value. What is said about the development of electricity and about 'character divers' and such-like subjects is full of value of suggestion. The book should, indeed, be described as a romance of science. It is singularly able and interesting, but wholly indescribable! Few volumes that have ever come under our hands are more entertaining to read or more difficult to criticise."

We are inclined to believe that "Hermes" could, if it pleased him, tell us more about Venus and Mercury than even about Mars. Let him communicate.—D. P.

WAIFS.

Gluck's Iphigenie en Tauride has been revived at Vienna.

At the next Philharmonic Concert, the pianist is to be Herr von Bülow, who will play Beethoven's Concerto, No. 5 (E flat.)

Prince Poniatowski is a candidate for the chair vacated by Carafa in the French Institute. Several other gentlemen aspire to the honour.

Le Ménestrel says that Lohengrin was "cut" for the Milan performance, not with a scissors, but with a hatchet. A third of the score disappeared.

On the recommendation of Alboni, M. Strakosch has engaged Mdlle. Marie Belval, daughter of the bass who appeared the season before last at Drury Lane.

The piece chosen for the gala performance, in connection with the marriage of Archduchess Giselle, of Austria, is Shakspere's Midsummer Night's Dream, with Mendelssohn's music.

A Stabat Mater, the composition of M. von Heddeghem, is announced to be given, with full orchestral accompaniments, at the Roman Catholic Cathedral, Cork, for the first time, next month.

Handel is coming into fashion on the Continent, Alexander's Feast having recently been performed at Paris, Belshazzar at Berlin, and Saul at Vienna. The last work was given under the direction of Herr Brahms.

Le Ménestrel announces the coming of a new tenor, a "really great tenor, who promises to be a Nourrit and Duprez in one." M. Halanzier will have the first benefit of this rara avis; Messrs. Gye and Mapleson will have the second.

Mr. A. Grant, the banker, has purchased from Madame Rossini her husband's inedited works, for the sum of 100,000 francs. They will now be published, and the profits will be handed over to the Royal Academy of Music and the Society of Musicians, jointly.

The Gewandhaus concerts closed with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony—the eighteenth work of the kind presented during the season. Of this number seven were by Beethoven, three by Schumann, two by Haydn, two by Schubert, one by Mendelssohn, and one by Raff.

Those who have anticipated the advent in England of Herr Richard Wagner will be disappointed. It is said that the master, who combines shrewdness in worldly things, with the high functions of his artistic position, wants a preliminary guarantee of 1000 guineas.

Herr Paul Semler, the conductor, and several of the gentlemen of the German Gymnasium Choral Society, attended the obsequies of the late German Ambassador, Count Bernstorff, on Wednesday, at the Royal Chapel, St. James's, and sang some "Grabgesänge" (chorales) by J. P. Schulz, &c.

Mr. Henry Smart is now writing an oratorio upon the subject of Jacob. We believe the work has been accepted by the committee of the Glasgow Festival, and will probably, be performed at the next festival of the three choirs. Something more than ordinarily good may be expected from our accomplished countryman.

During the scene in the Square of Ferrara, where Gennaro strikes the B out of the word Borgia, a young swell in the stalls turning to a lady sitting next to him, asked, "What's that fellow with the sword been doing?"—to which the lady promptly replied—"Beheading Borgia." The swell didn't see it, but smiled faintly out of politeness.

A Royal warrant has been promulgated, announcing that in future an allowance, not exceeding £80 per annum, will be paid to each regiment of cavalry and battalion of infantry of the line and colonial corps in aid of the expenses for providing regimental bands. Hitherto the expenses connected with military bands have fallen exclusively on the officers of the various corps.

Mr. Hoffmann, the pianist, son of Mr. R. Andrews, the veteran professor, of Bowden (Manchester), has been playing at the Philharmonic Society in New York. The Tribune writes:—"Mr. Hoffmann is always welcome to the concert-room, and it is a pity that the large general public has not more frequent opportunities of admiring his clean and beautiful touch, his dexterity and his taste. He played Weber's Concertstück admirably."

Signor Arditi at Vienna.—When the Italian performances in the Theatre an der Wien are spoken about, the name of Arditi should always be mentioned. His bâton, says a Vienna journal, is a true and clear delight. Whoever wishes to criticize this musical magician ought to hear the same orchestra in the Carnaval of Rome, and he will at once be convinced of the great importance of this conductor.—V. P.

A critic says, in the Liverpool Daily Courier: "Signor Aramburo made a decided hit with the audience, and it is certain that he has many of the requisites of an operatic tenor, but he has some faults, such as, no doubt, if he be young and tractable, he may overcome. A certain spasmodic termination of his holding notes, and a want of equality in his natural voice and falsetto, added to a listless, insipid style of acting, are his chief defects, and he should by all means strive to overcome them. They were most apparent in the delicious 'Spirito gentil,' which had none of that refined repose which Mario and Giuglini used to deliver it with. This solo, however, had other points which told on the audience, and the encore which awaited it was not without significance."

After the last appearance of Frau Otto Alvsleben at the Royal Theatre, on the occasion of the conclusion of her engagement, the Dresden Liedertafel gave her a serenade by torch-light, when two songs were sung—"In dem Himmel ruht die Erde" and "Der Abend senket dich liede." After the first song, the secretary of the Liedertafel spoke some hearty words of thanks, praising, at the same time, the high artistic merit of the much-esteemed lady. After the conclusion of the second song, the latter, who stood at her window, thanked the singers for their attention and friendliness which had given her the greatest pleasure. A last shout of "Auff Wieder sehen" was answered by Frau Alvsleben in the words, "We cannot be sure, but perhaps!" "Very soon, very soon," was then shouted back by many voices.

The Late Mr. Balfe.—Mrs. Balfe having offered to the British Museum the original scores of works by her husband, the gifted composer, the Trustees have accepted the gift in the following letter:—

"Madam,—I have had the honour to lay before the Trustees of the British Museum your letter of the 10th inst., presenting to the National Library the original scores of the well-known works of the late Mr. Balfe. The Trustees had great pleasure in accepting the original works of so eminent a master; and they have directed me to convey to you the expression of their special thanks for this very important donation, and to assure you that they value highly the sentiments expressed in your letter. I give a memorandum of the volumes already delivered, and I am to acquaint you that the Trustees will be most happy to receive the additional volume which you are good enough to offer to send them hereafter. I have the honour to be, Madam, your very obedient servant, J. Winter Jones, Principal Librarian. Mrs. Balfe.—Manuscript Scores of M. W. Balfe:—The Siege of Rochelle, 2 vols.; Maid of Artois, 2 vols; Catherine Grey, 2 vols.; Joan of Arc, 2 vols.; Diadeste, 1 vol.; Falstaff, 2 vols.; Le Puits d'Amour, 2 vols.; Bohemian Girl, 3 vols.; Daughter of St. Marc, 3 vols.; Les Quatre Fils d'Aymon, 3 vols.; Enchantress, 2 vols.; The Bondsman, 3 vols.; Maid of Honour, 3 vols.; The Sicilian Bride, 3 vols.; The Rose of Castille, 3 vols.; Satanella, 3 vols.; Bianca, 3 vols.; The Puritan's Daughter, 3 vols.; Blanche de Nevers, 4 vols.; and Armourer of Nantes, 3 vols."

The Liverpool Porcupine, in its last number, gives an opinion respecting some of Mr. Mapleson's new singers. The opinion is subjoined:—

"A few words must be devoted to Mr. Mapleson's 'novelties.' In the person of Signora Torriani, he has secured a very attractive vocalist, who is very near being a great singer. She has a rich, flexible voice, sings with precision and dramatic force, and always rises with the occasion, being at her best when the demands on her resources are greatest. Like most young singers now-a-days, Signora Torriani lacks finish and delicacy, but if her ambition is backed by study and perseverance, there is every prospect of her developing into a prima donna worthy of succeeding the reigning queens of song. With Signor Aramburo we are not so well pleased. His voice is an unmistakable tenore robusto, almost verging on the baritone range. The quality is good but rugged, and it will take a year or two of hard work and careful study to prune down vocal excrescences which alone deprive him of the right to be called a 'first tenor.' We speak from a single hearing of Signor Aramburo in the Trovatore, but the Edinburgh critics say that his Fernando is a great improvement over his Manrico. To-night we hope to judge for ourselves, and to leave the theatre under the same impression. While on this subject, we must, in justice to the young debutant, state that, owing to a ridiculous costume, his personal appearance in Manrico was not at all calculated to prepossess an audience in his favour. Of Mr. Mapleson's last new singer, Signor Del Puente, we can speak more favourably from a single hearing. He is young, handsome, and a good actor. His voice is a rich, manly baritone, a trifle rough at times, and at present its possessor has not acquired that suavity and artistic development which always secure a rapturous encore for 'Il Balen' when sung by Graziani or Santley, but which goes quite flat in the hands of less experienced artists."

Mr. Charles Mathews.—Mr. Mathews, on closing his engagement at the Alexandra Theatre, Liverpool, on Saturday evening week, gave the following characteristic address:—

"Ladies and Gentlemen,—Permit me to profit by the absence of my friends and address a word or two to you in private. I hear that a report has gone abroad that I am at present on my farewell visit. Nothing of the kind, ladies and gentlemen. You will not so easily get rid of me. It is a long time since I first made my appearance here, and I trust it will be a long time before I make my last. I have not the slightest wish to come upon the stage on crutches—but so long as I feel myself in good health, and have got before me so many kind friends, I will be in no hurry to leave it."

Birmingham playgoers preserve the privilege of hissing, as Miss Elise Holt has discovered. In the pantomime, the other night, at the Prince of Wales Theatre, some hisses were mingled with the applause. At length Miss Holt left the stage, after speaking her "lines," instead of completing her part in several scenes in which she is required to dance. When she came on in the last scene before the transformation she was visibly affected, and changed two lines, in which she announces the repetition of the pantomime every night, into the following:—

"It rests with you to say if I've done right
In not paying gallery-boys to applaud me every night."

All parts of the house cheered lustily in sympathy, and her victory would have been complete if she had not had to leave the stage dancing. As she was doing so the hiss was again heard, and Miss Holt precipitately gained the wing.

It is gratifying to know that the pecuniary difficulties, which a fortnight ago threatened to prevent the formation of a choir to represent Liverpool at the forthcoming national music meetings at the Crystal Palace, have been removed. The intention of the promoters, as contained in the prospectus, was to pay the railway fares to and fro, and allow each singer a sum of £2 towards expenses. The amount of subscriptions for this purpose, however, was so small that an appeal to the choir applicants was rendered necessary. This being handsomely responded to, the hindrances to the constitution of the choir were overcome; and on Saturday evening a numerously attended meeting of the singers was held in the lecture room of the Free Public Library, under the presidency of Mr. Drielsma, there being also present Mr. Willert Beale, Mr. J. Sanders (choir master), and Mr. J. Hawkins, honorary secretary. Mr. Beale announced that as there was an insufficient number of female applicants the choir would not be able to compete in Class II. The competition would, therefore, be confined to Classes III and IV, for which only 80 (male) voices were required. He urged the necessity of regular attendance at the rehearsals; and, by way of stimulus, reminded his hearers of the success achieved last year by the South Wales choir, which consisted almost entirely of colliers. Mr. Hawkins intimated that the choir would give one or two open rehearsals, the proceeds of which, together with additional subscriptions, he hoped would furnish funds sufficient for all their requirements. He expressed the belief that their mode of selecting the singers would produce a really efficient choir, which next year would form the nucleus of a large and well-trained chorus. Mr. Sanders having arranged the nights for rehearsal, a vote of thanks was accorded to the chairman, and the meeting terminated. As evidence of the interest manifested in this movement, it may be mentioned that applications from about 500 singers were received by Mr. Hawkins.

Halle.—The Sing-Akademie brought its winter season to a close with a highly successful performance of Handel's Messiah, under the direction of Herr Voretzsch.

Darmstadt.—The programme of the third Orchestral Concert, under the direction of Herr Nesvadba, comprised Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, in B flat major; the overture, or, as the composer terms it, the prelude, to the opera, Die Sieben Raben, by Herr Rheinberger; and Schubert's overture to Fierabras. Mdlle. Heermann executed some pieces for the harp, and Herr Greger, a special favourite, sang several songs.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine, (Longman & Co.,) they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from, Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May!
What joys attend thine advent gay!
On every tree the birdies sing,
From hill and dale glad echoes ring;
The lark, inspir'd, to Heav'n ascends,
The gurgling brook in beauty wends
By mossy bank and grassy brae,
Where violets bloom and lambkins play.
Delightful Spring—sweet month of May
What joys attend thine advent gay!

PREFACE.

No country possesses more good voices than England, and many voices would be a fortune to their owners if they knew how to use them.

Vocal Exercises, however, are much neglected, owing, in a great measure, to their monotony of passage and of style.

The object of these Studies is to make practice as attractive as possible, and the Waltz form has therefore been chosen for its liveliness.

A selection has been made of passages best suited to give flexibility to the voice, and the six Waltzes here presented contain the germs of a thorough method of vocal practice.

The Italian language is preferred on account of the openness of the vowels; but these studies can be used advantageously without words, by simply "vocalising" on the vowel A (pronounced in Italian, Ah.)

Commas (,) are placed where breath is to be taken. At first, however, pupils should practise each study very slowly, and draw breath whenever found necessary.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION.

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. VAN PRAAG.

MR. VAN PRAAG, who has been for many years past well known to the members of the Musical Profession, and the public, as holding a responsible position at the principal Concert-rooms of the West End, is now, in his 74th year. In addition to his failing health and strength, he has also recently become a widower, and is, by this sad bereavement, left alone, with not a relative in England to aid or take care of him. He has children in California who wish him to go out to them, and it is his own desire, notwithstanding his age and infirmities, to do so. Want of means for undertaking so long and expensive a journey, which his children are unable to supply, however, preclude the possibility of his leaving England. Under these circumstances, a few friends, well able to bear witness to his respectability, honesty, and courtesy in the discharge of the duties he has so "well and worthily fulfilled," are anxious to raise a Subscription in his behalf, to which contributions are earnestly and respectfully requested.

MUSIC IN "ANOTHER WORLD."

(From "The Sunday Times.")

Everybody must, by this time, have read extracts from, or notices of the remarkable book which purports to be a revelation to us, through "Hermes," of the being, doing, and enjoyment of the fortunate dwellers in Montalluyah. We may, therefore, plunge at once in medias res, without the otherwise inevitable speculations as to the manner in which the writer, or editor, would have us regard it. By some critics the work is spoken of as a satire upon the condition of things in our own planet; others describe the apparent good faith of "Hermes" as an assumption admirably carried out; while others, again, set down the whole book as the offspring of an imagination whose possessor, by intimate contemplation of his fancies, has come to look upon them as facts. We are not compelled to take any one of the three courses thus pointed out; but it may be interesting to state that in a preface to the third edition, just issued, "Hermes" gives renewed assurance of his own belief in Montalluyah and its beneficent Ruler. He remarks:—

"In specific or gracefully veiled terms, the editor has been accredited with inventive power, imagination and mastery of fiction. Though he cannot lay claim to such gifts, their application to him evidences the acumen of the writers; for in the actual state of the world's belief, unwilling to recognize the truth, they have ascribed to the author powers which alone could dress fiction in the garb of truth. In other words, a statue with life-like qualities has been supposed, where the living man has been ignored. The editor must, therefore, await a time, perhaps not far distant, when credence will be given to his assertion that the 'Fragments' have their source, not in his imagination, but in another planet. Meantime his grateful thanks are offered to those who—in the words of the first Preface—have 'tasted the fruit and judged of its flavour, though they beheld not the tree; profited by the diamonds, though they knew not how they were extracted from the mine; accepted what was found to be wholesome in the waters, though the source of the river was unknown.'"

The editor goes on to make other interesting statements, telling how he submitted the "Fragments" respecting "Character-Divers" to a recently deceased potentate, and how he had an interview with the late Professor Faraday respecting some of the electrical phenomena peculiar to Montalluyah. The Professor's view, we are told, was not favourable to the theory announced by "Hermes," who, however, shrewdly points out that the Montalluyah electricians themselves were at one time opposed to the now accepted doctrine, which doctrine was always true. "Hermes" next removes all suspicion of having taken the idea of his book from Lord Lytton's "Coming Race." "Besides," he observes, "the one ('Coming Race') describes an imaginary world with imaginary inhabitants; the other gives a faithful, though at present incomplete, account of an actually existing world, whose inhabitants are formed like those of our own planet."

Waiving all the questions involved in the foregoing remarks, it will be enough for our present purpose if we look upon the musical revelations of "Another World" as merely the offspring of a lively and poetical fancy. So regarded, they present a good deal to interest, and not a little to admire. "Hermes" has not yet told us much about the state of music in Montalluyah, but what we do learn from him excites a desire to know more. This is especially the case with regard to the harp used by the blessed dwellers in the Star City—a harp by the side of which our poor little instruments sink into utter insignificance. Think of it Pencerdd Gwalia, Aptomas, and all others who profess to be harpists—your brethren in Montalluyah play upon a gigantic machine which may be said to be "built" rather than "made." It is triply strung, and so arranged that, by the agency of the electric fluid, two sets of strings respond, at the performer's will, when the third set is struck, giving out a mass of harmony like some great organ. The idea of such an instrument is enough to make Parish Alvars turn in his grave with vexation that he was not a dweller in Montalluyah. But this is not all. The harp is something more than a gigantic example of electricity applied to sound. It is a thing of beauty which might have been shaped in a poet's dream. . . . . .

The writer of the Apocalypse does not give us details of the heavenly harp; but not even his vivid, poetic fancy could have conjured up anything more beautiful than the harp of Montalluyah. The thought of such a marvel is almost enough to make Mr. John Thomas smash his Erard in utter disgust. And now we want to know more of the Star City's instruments. What is its orchestra like? Is there the equivalent of a Broadwood "grand" in Montalluyah, and does that fortunate planet possess street organs and German bands? If so, some information respecting the character and management of these last might prove not less useful than interesting.

"Hermes" is the medium of throwing a good deal of light upon the nature and capacity of music in the world of which he speaks. We learn, for instance, that music there has a definite meaning, and can be used, without words, for the interchange of ideas. . . . . .

With such means at command, it is hardly necessary to say that the harp does in Montalluyah what the tongue, or the pen, or "the silent language of the eye," has to do on our planet. It is the great love-maker, and apropos of its use in that capacity a very pretty story is told. Great care seems to be taken in Montalluyah that all shall be able to use this music language. . . . . .

All this is very interesting and suggestive—so much so that, having read it, one is tempted to hunt through the book for further revelations. Unhappily "Hermes" does not tell us much more upon the same theme, and it will be necessary to await those particulars, the coming of which at a future time is plainly hinted. So much of shrewdness is combined in "Another World," with so much that is poetical in the highest degree, that we cannot afford to lose anything "Hermes" may have to communicate.

HERR PAUER'S LECTURES.

(From the "Times.")

Herr Ernst Pauer, the distinguished pianist and composer, has been delivering in Exeter Hall, under the anspices of the Sacred Harmonic Society, a series of Three Lectures on the Origin, Progress, and Perfection of Oratorio. Few existing cultivated amateurs, and, indeed, it may be added, few existing cultivated musicians, are better provided with the materials for such lectures than Herr Pauer, or better able to single out examples, from the earliest to the latest times, by which the growth of "oratorio" may be fitly and appropriately illustrated. That the lectures have created more than ordinary interest in musical circles is not surprising. Herr Pauer, besides being a practical musician of high rank, is a thorough master of the literature of his art, which sometime since was abundantly shown by the annotations prepared for his "Historical Recitals" of pianoforte music. The first of his lectures, just concluded, discussed, as might have been anticipated, the early origin of oratorio as instituted by St. Philip Neri down to the present times, when, as in the instances of Mendelssohn's St. Paul and Elijah, (Handel having set the example in Judas Maccabeæus, Samson, Solomon, &c.,) it has assumed the form and proportions of sacred drama, constructed upon events to be found either in the Old or New Testament. In his first lecture Herr Pauer referred in an instructive manner to the early songs of pilgrims, &c., proceeding gradually to the sacred cantata, exemplified in the works of the Italian musician, Carissimi—to two of the most important of which, Jephtha and Jonah, the English public were introduced respectively by Mr. John Hullah and Mr. Henry Leslie. In his second lecture ("transitional") Herr Pauer began by further references to the progress of oratorio, in Italy especially, dwelling upon those eminent composers, Stradella and Alessandro Scarlatti; practical illustrations being given from the former, whose sad career is well known to those acquainted with the history of the musical art, and whose John the Baptist was the most noted oratorio of its day. Thence to the Passion music, which, although coming originally from Italy—as may be said, in fact, of almost all forms of music, except the orchestral symphony—was an easy step; thence to Martin Luther and the people's "choral song," a still easier. Tunes by Heinrich Isaac and Haslar, who flourished respectively in the earlier period of the 16th and 17th centuries, were given—first as originally conceived, then in the shape of harmonized "chorals," as they are known to the present generation, and, indeed, have long been familiar. About Heinrich Schütz, the "father of German music," as Herr Pauer pronounces him (born near the close of the sixteenth century), a good deal was said, but not a word too much; and the excerpts produced from his Passion oratorios must have created a general desire to know more. Nor was a selection from the Passion of Richard Keiser less welcome, or a madrigal by Scarlatti, in five vocal parts (for women's voices). That at the third and concluding lecture we should come to John Sebastian Bach and Handel, to Carl Philip Emmanuel Bach (why not also Friedemann, Bach's eldest and most gifted son?), Graun, Haydn, Mozart, Beetboven, Schneider, and Spohr, down to Mendelssohn—in whose Elijah Herr Pauer says with truth that the technical element in the musical art has reached its highest degree of perfection—was, of course, to be counted on. A chorus from Mendelssohn's unfinished oratorio, Christus—"There shall a star arise"—was put down in the programme as the final illustration. Into further particulars it is needless to enter. Enough that Herr Pauer's "Lectures on the History of Oratorio," have been a genuine success, and should encourage the Sacred Harmonic Society in affording their patrons an opportunity of hearing something more of the kind. Herr Pauer had competent solo singers, chorus, and organist (Mr. Willing) to support him; and he himself being pianoforte accompanist, there was little or nothing to desire.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The opera selected for the début of Mdlle. Amalia Fossa, another of Mr. Gye's new importations, was La Traviata, the character assigned to her being naturally that of the unfortunate heroine. Mdlle. Fossa appears familiar with the business of the stage, and is, moreover, a singer of considerable taste and experience. Her voice is unequal, perhaps because it has been unequally trained; nevertheless, certain parts of its register are both pleasing and flexible—more especially when the singer does not labour too much to produce effect. In any case it is hardly in accordance with fair criticism to judge a new aspirant after a single hearing. Enough that in the first act of the opera Mdlle. Fossa was nervous; and this unquestionably influenced her delivery of "Ah fors è lui" and its brilliant sequel, "Sempre libera degg'io." Encouraged, however, at the fall of the curtain, by the warmly-expressed sympathy of the audience, she gained heart as she went on, sang the duet with the elder Germont (Signor Cotogni)—the prominent feature of Act II.—with no less sentiment than dramatic force, and made a real impression in Act III., not only in the plaintive soliloquy, "Addio del passata bei sogni ridenti," but in the duet with Alfredo, "Parigi o cara," its impassioned peroration, "Gran Dio—morir si giovane," and thence to the climax, the death of Violetta; which, however well pourtrayed, can hardly be otherwise than repulsive, even if Rachel herself were the personage whom phthisis has condemned, and brought to the catastrophe all that wonderful power of earnestness which distinguished her memorable representation of the death of Adrienne Lecouvreur, to whom poison has been treacherously administered by an unscrupulous rival. In conclusion, Mdlle. Fossa made a fairly good impression; and there can be little doubt that, as a "comprimaria," she might render excellent service to Mr. Gye's theatre by strengthening the cast of operas in various parts, which, although not of the highest importance, cannot in strict truth be termed subordinate.

Signor Nicolini's Alfredo is admirable throughout. Seldom, indeed, has the part of this utterly despicable personage been redeemed by more grace of utterance, more unaffected manliness of demeanour. In short, the character is represented as well as could possibly be conceived; and the music is given in a style with which Verdi, the composer, himself could not easily find fault. More refined singing has not often been heard than that of Signor Nicolini, in the soliloquy at the opening of Act II—including the air, "De' miei bollenti spiriti," which often passes with little notice, but now earned a well-deserved and unanimous call for the singer, who was no less to be admired in the last duet with Violetta, comprising the already mentioned "Parigi o cara." Signor Cotogni, who undertook the part of Alfredo's father, was a little "out of voice," but sang, as he invariably sings, like a genuine artist, and acted with true intelligence. His delivery of the somewhat lackadaisical air, "Di provenza il mare," was loudly applauded—so much so, indeed, that he might readily, and to the gratification of the audience, have sung it again. Having spoken in detail about the three conspicuous characters, it will suffice to add that the minor parts were more or less efficiently supported by Mdlles. Anese and Corsi, Messrs. Tagliafico, Manfredi, Fallar, Raguer, Rossi, &c.; that the orchestra and chorus was generally efficient; and that Signor Vianesi was conductor.

On Saturday the Africaine was repeated. Mdlle. Angeri (Selika) was more at her ease than on the occasion of her début, and created a still more favourable impression. About the rest of the performance it is needless to speak again.

On Tuesday La Favorita was played for the début of two new artists—Madame Paoli and Mdlle. Sassi, and for the re-appearance of an old favourite—M. Faure. Madame Paoli made a decidedly favourable impression as Leonora, notwithstanding the fact that she necessarily challenged comparison with Madame Lucca in one of her best parts. The new comer is personally well fitted for stage work, and seems to have profited much by considerable experience as an actress; so much so that she has acquired more than ordinary power in this branch of her art. All she does is marked by a gratifying absence of self-consciousness, and an obvious sympathy with the dramatic situation, prudently controlled by self-restraint. We are disposed to think, however, that Madame Paoli is too careful in her avoidance of exaggeration, and that had she given the reins to dramatic feeling where the business of her part demanded it she would have done better. But the same self-restraint was noticeable in her singing. Her voice is of sufficient power, its lower notes excepted, and might have been used to greater effect than was actually produced by frequent employment of a mezza-voce which, though of charming quality, could not fill so large a theatre. Allowance should, doubtless, be made for the natural anxiousness of a débutante, and, having done this with regard to the points indicated, there can be no question that Mdme. Paoli is an acquisition of value to Mr. Gye's company. Her success in the first act was decided, the duet with Signor Nicolini (Fernando), bringing down the curtain amid loud applause, followed by a "call." In "O mio Fernando" Mdme. Paoli seemed over-anxious; and, though artistic skill was evident in all she did, it cannot be said that expectations called forth by the duet just referred to were fully realized. The ground thus lost was, however, made up in the final scene of the opera. Here Mdme. Paoli so met the exigencies of a trying situation as to send the audience away in a mood very favourable to her future success. Every one who applauded the new prima donna will be ready to give her a warm reception when she essays a part better adapted to test her versatility than the always tragic Leonora of Donizetti. Mdlle. Sassi, the second débutante, cannot fairly be judged in so small a part as Inez. That she is a novice, and that appearances are in her favour, might, however, be safely put on record. M. Faure was received with prolonged applause, and his embodiment of the Spanish king did everything possible to justify the high favour in which he is held as an artist-musician of rare attainments. So admirably did the French baritone acquit himself, that he conveyed an impression of being much too good for a contemptible character like Alphonse. Even when Fernando hurled back the honours conferred on him, M. Faure could not make the king appear utterly degraded. Something of royalty, besides the royal mantle, clung to the monarch's form. It is needless to particularise M. Faure's successes throughout the evening. Enough that he was always the accomplished singer and no less accomplished actor—always, too, the favourite of the public. Signor Nicolini, who has definitely taken up the part which Mario laid down on the memorable evening of his retirement, played Fernando with unwonted spirit and success. As his great predecessor recedes further and further into the past Signor Nicolini appears more and more at his ease, and gives freer play to the promptings of his own unquestionable talent. The result, on Tuesday night, was that in the third and fourth acts he excited the genuine admiration of the audience. As on previous occasions, however, the great scene with the King was wrought up to a climax earlier than should have been the case. Signor Nicolini had done his best before the sword of Fernando was broken, and flung at the monarch's feet. This apart, the assumption was an able one, deserving of very high praise. Signor Rossi again proved an efficient Gasparo; and Signor Bagagiolo did all needful justice both to the character and music of Baldassare. It is scarcely necessary to add that the impressive mise-en-scène of the last act made its usual effect, or that the general performance of so well-known an opera was creditable to the conductor, Signor Vianesi.

On Thursday night, Mdlle. Fossa appeared as Marguerite, in Gounod's Faust.

BRESLAU.—The programme of the eleventh concert of the Orchestral Union contained three novelties. The first was a Canonic Suite, by Herr J. O. Grimm, formerly a pupil of the Leipsic Conservatory. Though too profound ever to please the general public, it was well received, and proved that its composer had not studied in vain the more recondite portions of his art. The second novelty was a "Concertstück for Orchestra, in the form of an Overture," by Herr B. Scholz. It is called, "Im Freien." The third novelty—here at least—was Haydn's Symphony in C major, long suffered to lie forgotten and neglected. Herr Julius Stockhausen sang an air from St. Paul, an air from Le Nozze, and three airs by Schubert. The concert was brought to a close with Mendelssohn's Overture to Ruy Blas. All the songs were accompanied by Herr Scholz, who conducted, also, the instrumental pieces.

RIGA.—A three-act opera, Mirjam, has been successfully produced, the book by Herr Alfred Formey, the music by Herr August Klughardt, of Weimar. The story is founded upon the history of Jephtha and his daughter, whom the author has christened "Mirjam."

MUSIC IN MILAN.

(From a Correspondent.)

If Lohengrin has not produced a favourable impression at the Scala, it has certainly caused a great commotion there and elsewhere. It appears that, in order to prop up Herr R. Wagner's production, his partisans wished to call in the military, and arrest all persons hissing. The Trovatore suggests that they should go a little farther, and, after having arrested all those who hissed, subject to the same summary process all those who did not applaud. By the way, a red-hot Wagnerite has been accusing Signor Tito Ricordi—but we will let the Signor speak for himself: "Some person, who measures others by his own measure, has been spreading a report that the hissers at the Scala are sent in, and paid by the firm of Ricordi; and some persons have believed it. Were we to be indignant at this calumny, we should make both our enemies and friends laugh. We will simply recall to mind the fact that, in the year 1857, a report was spread about that Signor Ricordi, the publisher, had paid persons to applaud Verdi's Simon Bocanegra (as the reader perceives, even calumny has progressed); Tito Ricordi published in the Gazzetta Musicale the following declaration: 'I declare in the most ample form, and before the world, that I am ready and willing to give a handsome sum of money for every ticket which it shall be proved that I, directly or indirectly, gave, bought, or procured for any person enjoining him, openly or by insinuation, to applaud and support, in return, the opera Simon Bocanegra. I will even extend my proposal. I will pay a handsome sum for every ticket which I can be proved to have given directly or indirectly, or caused to be given, to anyone, at any time, for any theatre, with a view of applauding or supporting any opera being my property, and of hissing or putting down any opera belonging to others.—TITO RICORDI.' This offer, made on one occasion only, remained always in force, but never cost the house a centime. If he believes his own falsehood, the Wagnerite who accuses us may try whether he is not more fortunate.—GIULIO RICORDI."

On the 30th ult., Lohengrin was performed for, it is said, the last time. The season will be continued with Un Ballo in Maschera and Ruy Blas, pending the production of Signor Perelli's opera, Viola Pisani.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

There were some attractive features in the concert given last Friday evening by the Amateur Orchestral Society; and first among them must be placed the part-singing of the amateur vocalists who rejoice to call themselves "Moray Minstrels." Under the guidance of Mr. John Foster, these gentlemen performed a selection of music in really excellent style; the precision, refinement, and quality of tone which marked their efforts leaving very little for even fastidiousness to desire. We strongly suspect that a majority of the audience preferred the singing amateurs to their brethren of the orchestra, and regretfully saw them leave the platform to assume more or less picturesque attitudes on the lounges of the arena. The solo vocalists were Mdlle. Limia and Mr. Santley, who were announced to sing "en amateur." We do not know the precise signification of the term, as used, but we are sure that Mr. Santley never sang better in his life. His splendid voice filled the hall, apparently without effort, and the finished excellence of his work appealed to the entire audience. The result was an encore of Sullivan's "A weary lot is thine, fair maid;" a unanimous demand for a repetition of Hatton's "British tar;" and, after Boyce's "Hearts of Oak" had been substituted, a recall, best described by the word tumultuous. Never did an "amateur" excite such genuine enthusiasm. With respect to the playing of the multitudinous orchestra, the less said the better. The gentlemen over whom Mr. Sullivan's bâton exercises a vague authority suffer from the "ignorant impatience" which has wrecked so many amateur ventures. They want—at least, we must assume as much, because their conductor would hardly, of his own volition, lead them into difficulties—to attack works which severely try disciplined professionals; and that at a time when their execution of the simplest passage is perfect neither as regards time nor tune. It would answer no purpose were we to criticise in detail the rendering of the overtures to Oberon and Masaniello and the first movement of Schumann's symphony in B flat. But if any words of ours could persuade the amateurs to "repress their noble rage," and work hard at overtures like that to The Caliph of Bagdad, and symphonies like the early ones of Haydn, those words should cheerfully be spoken.—Daily Telegraph.

PASSION WEEK CONCERTS.

Performances of Bach's great Passion are now, happily, so frequent as not to require notice unless given under special conditions, like those which excited interest at the Royal Albert Hall on the first four evenings of this week. When Mr. Barnby, to whom the musical world is indebted for the revival of a noble work, first brought out the Passion, he was reproached with turning the chorales into "part-songs;" and doubtless, from the stand-point of severely just criticism, his critics were right. Allowance should have been made, however—and many made it—for the necessity of doing all that was possible to increase the attraction of music by no means of an ad captandum sort. It was foreseen that the necessity could only endure for a little while, because increased knowledge of Bach's noble and pious work must lead inevitably to admiration; and it was hoped that, once established in favour, the composer's intentions as to the work would be rigidly carried out. Mr. Barnby is now justifying the hope as a result of the truthfulness of the foresight. Indeed, he has passed at a step from one extreme to the other, so that, instead of having the chorales sung with studied care by way of an entertainment, he invites the audience to rise and join in the melodies, precisely as did the Lutheran worshippers for whom Bach wrote. The step was a bold one, and the season of Passion-tide was very properly chosen in which to take it, because most obviously presenting an opportunity for the union of musical edification and religious observance necessary to the intended effect of the work. The Royal Albert Hall, on the first four evenings of the present week was, therefore, something between a concert-room and a place of worship—as every place should be, at all times, when the Great Tragedy is rehearsed. Due precautions were taken for the encouragement of the audience in the discharge of their new duty—brass instruments being stationed at advantageous points to keep up the pitch, while the conductor faced round and emphatically marked the time. But, even stimulated so, the "great congregation" was at first decidedly shy of the work it had to do, or else a majority preferred listening to the effect rather than helping to increase it. Afterwards better results became apparent; and in cases where the melody was familiar, a grand ensemble more than justified Mr. Barnby's venture, and established a precedent for future occasions. The general performance of the work gave satisfaction, all the choral numbers being as well rendered as on former occasions under Mr. Barnby's direction. Mdme. Alvsleben, Mdme. Patey, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Signor Foli shared the principal solos on Monday night, the German soprano distinguishing herself by a revival of a previously unheard air, "For love my Saviour suffered," and otherwise by a good and careful reading of the music. Mdme. Patey sang to perfection the lovely aria, "See the Saviour," and Mr. Cummings declaimed the arduous recitatives with his usual clearness of enunciation and fulness of meaning. Signor Foli gave sonorous delivery to the words of Jesus, the secondary bass solos being admirably rendered by Mr. Thurley Beale. A word of praise is due to Herr Straus, for his capital violin obbligato in "Have mercy upon me," to Mr. Hoyte, for efficiently presiding at the organ, and to Signor Randegger, for accompanying the recitatives with great good taste. To-night the Messiah is to be given.

MENDELSSOHN'S ITALIAN SYMPHONY.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—A great deal has been said of the Italian Symphony, but not half enough. It is one of the most inspired and finished pieces of art-workmanship in existence. Mendelssohn never heard it played as it is now played on occasions (under Manns) at the Crystal Palace Concerts. He never heard it at all in his own country. Schumann, who mistakes the Scotch Symphony for the Italian Symphony, was wholly ignorant of the latter, which never came before him.—Yours obediently,

LACKLAND FIDGE, M.D.

[We hold with Dr. Fidge in every particular.—A.S.S.]

BONN.—The following notice has been published by Herr Kaufmann, Chief Burgomaster, and chairman of the Schumann Festival Committee. "Robert Schumann died on the 29th June, 1856, and his ashes repose in the cemetery of the town of Bonn. Since then this great composer has become gradually better understood, and his fame has gone on increasing; his works enjoy at the present day so high an amount of appreciation, that we look forward to universal support in getting up at Bonn a memorial festival in his honour, and, with the proceeds which accrue therefrom, erecting over the spot where he rests a monument adorned with his effigy, and 'raised by his admirers assembled at Bonn, on the ——.' The festival will be held in the second half of August, this year. Further particulars will be duly announced."

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

A season of almost unprecedented success closed on Monday evening with the usual "benefit" of the able and experienced director, Mr. A. S. Chappell, whose patrons crowded the hall to its doors. Mr. Chappell might safely have trusted to the strength of his own claims, and have provided nothing more than the customary brief but excellent programme. It is his rule, however, to make the last concert a kind of formal leave-taking between artists and public, and the rule was duly observed on Monday to the general gratification. With one or two exceptions, all the instrumentalists who have been heard during the season made their appearance, and nearly all played solos more or less identified with their respective names. The very popularity of the selected works renders a detailed notice of them superfluous. Not a word need be said, for example, about Herr Joachim's performance of Tartini's "Il Trillo del Diavolo," Mr. Hallé's execution of Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor, or the reading, by Madame Schumann, of Mendelssohn's own arrangement of the Scherzo from his music to A Midsummer Night's Dream. As with these efforts so with those of Mdme. Néruda, Signor Piatti, and the Masters Le Jeune, who essayed, with more skill than effect, to play Fugues upon the machine which, in St. James's Hall, represents an organ. Mr. Santley sang three of his best songs, and Sir Julius Benedict was a matchless accompanist. With such a constellation of "bright, particular stars," the success of the concert is easy to imagine, especially as the audience used the occasion of each performance to show their personal regard for the performer. The leave-taking in some cases was of the warmest character—such as amply showed how thorough is the sympathy existing between Mr. Chappell's artists and his public. But why did not the audience call for Mr. Chappell himself? The honour of an "ovation" was never better deserved than by the admirable entrepreneur to whom London owes the most instructive and, we are happy to add, the most prosperous of existing musical institutions.

Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales was present, and remained till the conclusion of the concert.

We promise our readers a general survey of what has been done in the fifteenth season of the Monday Popular Concerts, which will be resumed in November.

ST. THOMAS'S CHORAL SOCIETY.

(From an old Correspondent.)

On Thursday, the 3rd inst., a performance of Costa's Naaman was given at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, by the St. Thomas's Choral Society—a private society established by Signor Randegger, and which, under the skilled and vigilant supervision of that gentleman, has reached a state of excellence seldom attained by amateur associations. Of the high value of Signor Randegger's discipline in the arts of choral training, numerous proofs were afforded on the occasion in question. The choruses of Naaman, it is true, are neither very erudite nor exacting, but the delicacy and finish with which they were, with scarcely an exception, executed, betokened not only the good quality of the teaching, but the quick and sensitive intelligence of the taught. Signor Randegger has reason to be proud of the society which he rules so well. Amateur performances of works of the large dimensions of Naaman, are not usually the most perfect things in the world. Much has to be taken for granted, much excused, and good intentions accepted in lieu of good deeds. It is pleasant, therefore, in proportion to its novelty, to find the possibility of private choral bodies challenging something like approbation, in the genuine sense of the word, and depending rather upon the absolute merit of what is done, than upon simple honesty of purpose. The audience on Thursday week were not slow to recognize the efficiency of the singing; and many of the choral pieces of the oratorio were applauded in a spirit of unaffected compliment and enjoyment. The solos were sung by several members of the Royal Academy of Music—namely, Miss Jessie Jones, Miss Annie Butterworth, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Wadmore, assisted by Miss Bertha Griffiths and Mr. J. Greenhill; the principal soprano duties devolving upon Miss Emily Spiller, a lady whose experience in the concert-room is well-known, and whose singing is always welcome. Mr. Edwin Bending presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Willing at the organ. At the close of the oratorio Signor Randegger was loudly applauded; and in this demonstration his two hundred pupils were, no doubt, equitably entitled to share.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The students gave an extra concert at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Wednesday evening, April 9th. The following is the programme:—

Quartet, in D (MS.), for two violins, viola, and violoncello—Allegro, Adagio affettuoso, Minuet—Allegretto con grazia, Allegro molto (F. T. Barnard, student), Mr. Palmer, Mr. Szczepanowski, Mr. Regan, and Mr. Buels; Part-song (MS.), "Soldier, rest" (Roberts, student); Study, in A minor (Cipriani Potter), Characteristic study, "Contradiction" (Moscheles), pianoforte, Miss Harper; Prelude, Fugue, Allemande, and Gigue, from Suite in F minor (Handel), pianoforte, Mrs. Marshall; Song, "Du bist die ruh" (Schubert), Miss George; Andante and Scherzo, from Sonata in A flat, Op. 39 (Weber), pianoforte, Miss Sheehan; Trio, "Ave Maria" (Schloesser), Miss Beasley (Westmorland scholar), Miss Barkley, and Mr. Howells; Enigma, in G, for the Pianoforte, Fantasia and Variations in the style of five eminent artists (Cipriani Potter), Miss Baglehole (Potter Exhibitioner); Part-song, "They whom we loved on earth" (Westlake); Sonata, in G, Op. 30, No. 3, Allegro assai, Minuetto — Molto moderato e grazioso, Allegro vivace (Beethoven), pianoforte and violin, Mr. Ridgway and Mr. Szczepanowski; Sarabande, Gavotte, and Gigue, from third English Suite, in G minor (J. S. Bach), pianoforte, Miss Edith Brand. Three musical sketches (Op. 10), "The lake," "The mill-stream," and "The fountain," (W. Sterndale Bennett) pianoforte, Miss Pamphilon; Three-part songs for female voices, "Hours of rest" and "The secret," (Ferdinand Hiller) Misses Bagnall, Conolly, Nessie Goode, Jessie Jones, Smith, Daniel, George, Mann, Mount, Butterworth, Bolton, Buley, Roffe, and Spencer; Impromptu, in C minor (No. 1, Op. 90), (Schubert) pianoforte, Miss Edridge; Aria, "O del mio dolce ardor" (Gluck), Miss Annie Butterworth; Lieder ohne Worte, in F minor, (Kirchner) pianoforte, Mr. Arthur Jackson; Madrigal (MS.), "O nightingale" (Henry Guy, student); Lieder ohne Worte (Nos. 3 and 4, Book II.), (Mendelssohn) pianoforte, Miss Chapman; Quartetto, "I canta storie" (Pinsuti), Miss Llewellyn Bagnall, Miss Butterworth, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Wadmore.

All the students were "on their metal," especially Miss Pamphilon, who played Sir Sterndale Bennett's "Three musical sketches" con amore; Miss Annie Butterworth, who sang Gluck's aria, "O del mio dolce ardor," charmingly; and Miss L. Bagnall, Miss Butterworth, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Wadmore, who did ample justice to Signor Pinsuti's quartet, "I canta storie;" although Mr. Guy was evidently suffering from cold he did not the less exert himself to render his part effectively. Mr. Eaton Faning (Mendelssohn Scholar) and Mr. Walter Fitton accompanied the vocal music on the pianoforte.

GREAT MUSICAL FESTIVALS IN VIENNA.

4TH AND 11TH MAY, 1873.

(Communicated.)

The Society of the Amateurs of Musik in Vienna, intending to make appear the musical powers of Vienna in a solemn manner, will give two great musical festivals, in co-operation with the far-renowned Institutions, the Association of Gentlemen Singers (Männergesangverein), the Phylharmonic Society (Orchestra of the great Imperial Opera), and the Society of Song (Singverein), and assisted by the first solo performers in song and on instruments.

The concerts shall take place on the 4th and 11th May, at noon, in the great and splendid Musikhall of the above said society.

The programme of the first concert will include the most celebrated compositions by Franz Schubert, that of the second, the greatest works by Beethoven, among them the Ninth Symphony.

Gentlemen and ladies intending to visit the great International Exhibition, and desirous to secure seats at those festivals, are requested to send soonest orders for tickets, by letter or telegram, to the office of the Society of Music, Musikvereinskanalei, Lothringerstrasse 11, Vienna.

Prices—8, 6, 4, and 2 fl. Austr. m.

Orestes.

(From "Another World.")

Orestes is the name of a man who invented an ingenious instrument for discovering diamonds in the bowels of the earth, and for penetrating to the spot where they lay. This instrument possesses an electricity sympathetic to diamonds only. The presence of them is indicated by an exceedingly sensitive arm of the instrument which, being retained on the spot indicated, puts forth tendrils that gradually perforate the earth, and do not stop until a precious stone is reached. ## CRYSTAL PALACE.—GOOD FRIDAY.

The fifty thousand subjects of Her Majesty who make their annual holiday at the Crystal Palace on Good Friday, found the attractions provided for them this year equal to all former occasions. The Grand Sacred Concert took place, as usual, on the Great Handel Orchestra, in the Centre Transept, at half-past three o'clock. Besides the Orchestral Band of the Company, the full Band of the Coldstream Guards took part in the Concert, and, in addition, played selections of Sacred Music before and after, under the able conductorship of Mr. F. Godfrey. Mr. James Coward presided at the Great Handel Festival Organ, and the concert was conducted, as heretofore, by Mr. Manns.

The New Exhibition of Pictures, including the wonderful Russian sketches (in oil), of Central Asia, taken by M. Basil Wereschagin, during the campaign of Samarkand in 1868, where he was an eye-witness of the actions and events which he sketched, was placed in the Private Saloon of the Picture Gallery. The Australasian collection of objects, models, photographs, &c., &c., from Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, New Caledonia, Feejee, the Solomon Islands, &c., illustrating the natural history, manners and customs, and modes of life of those countries, formed by Mr. H. E. Pain, was open to the public in the South-East Gallery. The Tibet and Yarkund Court, arranged by Dr. David Price, in the Tropical Department, from the collections of Mr. Commissioner Forsyth, C.B., and Dr. Cayley, contains ethnological groups of Tibetans, Yarkundis, Lama Priest, &c., as well as objects illustrating the costumes, habits, commerce, &c., of the people. The Great Aquarium, situate at the North or Tropical End of the Palace, attracted as much interest as ever. Fresh arrivals of rare animals are continually reported, amongst which may be mentioned a number of Sea Horses from the South of France. Special arrangements were made with the several railway companies to run special trains to and from the Palace as often as required.

On Easter Monday will be produced a grand spectacular burlesque, entitled Blue Beard, the great Bashaw, or The loves of Selim and Fatima, written by H. T. Arden, Esq. The scenery is by Mr. F. Fenton, the music by Mr. J. Barnard, the ballet by Madame Collier, and the whole will be produced under the direction of Mr. T. H. Friend, the Company's stage manager. The principal characters in the piece will be supported by Mr. Edward Terry (of the Royal Strand Theatre), Mr. W. Rowella, Mr. T. H. Friend; Miss Emmeline Cole, and Miss Caroline Parkes. There will be a miscellaneous entertainment, commencing at half-past twelve o'clock, including Doughty's celebrated troupe of performing dogs; the renowned Perks Family, with their celebrated stud of highly trained ponies, &c.; and a comic ballet by the Great Little Rowella and troupe.

The number of visitors at the Palace last year, on Good Friday, was 89,797, and on Easter Monday, 44,218.

Posen.—Moniuszko's opera, Halka, was produced at the Stadttheater a short time since, being the first national Polish work of the kind ever represented upon a German stage. It was first produced in 1858, at Warsaw. Since then it has been performed, some two hundred times, in Prague, Milan, and St. Petersburg. The Posener Zeitung thus speaks of its first production here: "The libretto of Halka is of the simplest description, the author, Wlad. Wolski, presenting us with a sort of village story from the Carpathians. This story is such as might happen anywhere; of national local colouring, of the slightest national tendency, the subject of the opera does not contain a trace. As, notwithstanding, Halka is designated a specifically national opera by the Poles themselves, we must look for the reason elsewhere than in the book—in the music. On this point a Polish paper observes: 'The people sang at one time merry, and, at another, mournful songs, but there was no strong master to collect, in one beautiful and grandiose whole, these little fragments, these strains wafted from the meads and plains of our second fatherland—to create a work in which the nation should behold itself as in a mirror, and, on hearing the melodies, exclaim: So do I sing, when I am sorrowful; so do I sing, when I am joyously moved; in these melodies do I feel my soul, and the throbbing of my own heart.'—The music of Halka is beautiful, and thoroughly peculiar—it is Sclavonic."

Vienna.—Herr von Adelburg, the composer of the opera entitled Zring, produced very successfully at the National Theatre, Pesth, has been lying here several months, dangerously ill from the effect of paralysis. Among the most recent works of this gentleman, who is still very young, and who is mentioned in Brendel's Geschichte der Musik, as possessing great talent, may be mentioned a cantata entitled Krieg und Frieden; a Te Deum for chorus and orchestra, performed in Mexico, at the coronation of the unfortunate Maximilian; and an opera, Wallenstein, founded upon Schiller's trilogy.

Rome.—Guillaume Tell has been successfully produced at the Teatro Apollo, the principal parts being sustained by Signora Contarini, Signori Lefranc, Aldighieri, and David.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

The Standard thus prefaces its report of the production of the new operetta, Fleur de Lys, at the Philharmonic Theatre:—

"For some weeks past the walls of London have been placarded with the title, in gigantic letters, of an opera bouffe by Mr. Farnie, who might be suspected of keeping a manufactory of such wares, so abundantly does he seem to stock the theatrical market with them. Fleur de Lys is the name he has bestowed on this last specimen of his handiwork, the substance of which is derived from a French work by Messrs. Gille and Jaime, fils, which appeared some few years since at the Theatre des Variétés, with music by M. Leo Delibes, under the title of La Cour du Roi Petaud, but failed to achieve any permanent success. The libretto of the original opera bouffe, though not a work of the highest class in its kind, yet contains a fair number of amusing situations, possesses not a little ingenuity of invention and some passages of graceful and piquant love-making, and is full of amusing or interesting characters, distinctly and sharply drawn. With such materials it might be thought that the prospect offered of their revival by another hand would be a promising one; and so it might had not that hand been Mr. Farnie's, whose dramatic work resembles in too many instances nothing so much as the product of an ingenious instrument known to British industry as 'a devil,' and possessing the property, when put in action, of tearing up every sort of previously manufactured material submitted to it to a fine fluff, known indifferently as 'shoddy,' or 'devil's dust,' and used to give fictitious substance to wefts of an otherwise meagre and threadbare texture. The latter part of the process, however, is omitted by Mr. Farnie, who simply sets his 'shoddy' before the world in the chaotic and formless heap to which he has reduced it; but as certain parts of the original garment resist the shredding process of the instrument in question by their inherent indestructibility, such as button-shanks, lace trimming, &c., so some parts of the work thus treated by the adapter survive and shine out from the mass, and to these is he indebted for the greater part of the success he is enabled to obtain. In this instance, the first act of the French piece is that which contains the most fun, and it is also the most dramatically effective; but the havoc made with its whole point and intention, either by blundering incapacity or that sort of resistance to the point of a joke said to be an especial peculiarity of the Scottish cranium, looks like the result of wilful perversity. The second act retains a few small particles of the fun which does not abound in the same portion even of the original, and the last act preserves a pretty situation in the beginning, and an amusing episode at the end, and on these limited supports the adaptation limps on to the fall of the curtain. To the French material thus grievously maimed and attenuated is added a liberal intermixture of feeble quasi-jocularity, consisting chiefly in allusions to the subjects of trade advertisements in the press and on the boardings, which, together with the current jests of light periodical literature, seem to occupy an inordinate proportion of the retentive memory of Mr. Farnie, who would appear to have as absolute a faith in the popular efficacy of topical allusions when made to do service for wit as the late Mr. Albert Smith. A comic song of the music-hall type in the second act, introducing the names of certain prominent statesmen, sounded like a faint echo from the Happy Land, and was probably smuggled in unsanctioned by the Chamberlain; but lacking as it does either point or force, need not alarm official susceptibility. Of the poetry furnished to the music of the French composer by Mr. Farnie we had not an opportunity of judging, it being omitted from the printed book, but as far as we could catch it, from the not over distinct utterance of the singers, it was characterised by his usual facility of versification and command of the vocabulary in use among modern climbers of Parnassus. Let us here note that distinct pronunciation of the words is more essential to the effect of opera bouffe than any other class of lyrical composition for the stage, as on the language so much more depends to indicate the nature of the situation illustrated by the music."

In its report of the performances now going on at the Holborn Amphitheatre, the Standard has the following especially musical peroration:—

"An orchestra, reared upon the plan of M. Jullien, occupies the stage space, and discourses most excellent music, in which we were much struck with the ubiquitous nature of the drummer-boy, who appeared to have a universal facility for various instruments. From the original occupation of parchment-pounding, a sudden transition found him engaged in clashing the cymbals, tickling the tympani, coquetting with the castanets, and tinkling the triangle, all apparently at the same moment, with infinite ease and spirit, yet with plenty of leisure to attend to the turning of his music sheets. Why was not this down in the bill—to us it was no small gratification as a feat of no ordinary difficulty."

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 12, 1873.

THE Passion Week of 1873 will surely be memorable in the history of music, on account of a phenomenon hitherto unmatched. We refer, of course, to the multiplied performances of Bach's greatest Passion, at the Royal Albert Hall, under Mr. Barnby, and its introduction to St. Paul's Cathedral by Dr. Stainer. Looking at the character of the music—in which severity of style, intellectual as well as emotional power, and lofty scorn of popularity-hunting, are conspicuous—the general favour now shown to it is very remarkable. According to some, that favour is no more than a result of the religious instinct of the English people. The music, they say, is heard more because of the narrative to which it is allied than for its own sake. We cannot receive this explanation. When the Bach Society first introduced the Passion, and gave two capital performances of it in St. Martin's Hall, under Sterndale Bennett's direction, and with all the prestige of Royal patronage, the religious instinct was at least as strong as it is now. Yet nothing came of the effort beyond a nine days' curiosity. The Passion was replaced on the dusty bookshelf whence it had been taken, nobody caring to remonstrate save a few people, who were regarded as monomaniacs suffering from an antiquarian craze. On the shelf the Passion remained till Mr. Barnby—to whom all honour is due for the act—took it down, and manfully set about teaching the people what a masterpiece they had ignorantly neglected. Everybody knows that his task proved anything but Herculean. Mr. Barnby himself must have been astonished at the ready reception given to the work, and at its rapid ascent to a place in general favour, of which the most sanguine never dreamed. We can only explain the contrast between the non-success of the Bach Society and the very different fortune of Mr. Barnby, by attributing it to an enormous advance in genuine musical taste. Being English, we are accustomed to grumble at the condition of musical things in our own country, and there is, doubtless, much room for improvement; but, with all the faults upon which pessimists love to dwell, that public cannot be in a "bad way" by whom such a work as the Passion is esteemed. Indeed, we are justly entitled to boast concerning the position it has assumed, and to put the fact in evidence of high musical culture. No country in the world can show anything like it; even Germany, the much-belauded home of the "divine art," being left behind. What would the dwellers in Vienna, Berlin, or Leipsic say to five performances of the Passion in a single week, when, only by taking much thought and running a desperate risk, can they manage one? We accept the popularity of Bach's work as a sign of the times, and a very agreeable and comforting sign to all who are jealous for the honour of the reputed most unmusical, but, in fact, the most musical country under the sun.

While dwelling thus complacently on a phenomenon of cheerful import, it would be unjust to forget those who have aided its development; and here we must again cite the name of Mr. Barnby. To him belongs the credit of having revived the Passion; and, as the present week's doings prove, he retains his place as its foremost advocate and champion. The Albert Hall concerts on Monday and three following days were bold but successful efforts to introduce into the concert room those observances, without which Bach's noble scheme can never be properly worked out. Upon the courage which suggested the participation of the audience in the chorales, Mr. Barnby deserves to be warmly congratulated; and the degree of success attained was a fitting as well as an adequate reward.

OCCASIONAL NOTE.

THE London correspondent of the Liverpool Porcupine, in one of his most recent letters, thus refers to the remarkable book called "Another World," about the authorship of which there are so many rumours in literary and artistic circles:—

"I suppose you have noticed the sudden mania which has seized some of our litterateurs and dramatists for writing satirical romances and plays. One of the most popular of those romances is 'Erewohn,' which has been a great success, but its popularity will probably be rivalled by 'Another World,' which is now creating quite a sensation in literary circles. The author, who has adopted the nom de plume of 'Hermes,' is said to be a well-known journalist. The scene of 'Another World' is laid in a star, and the author takes admirable advantage of this fact to satirise the follies and lash the vices of this particular world in which we wicked mortals manage to exist, in spite of strikes, coal rigs, and ship-scuttling."

We hear that a third edition of "Another World," with a new and explanatory preface, is already in the press.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—In the Favorita to-night the part of Leonora is to be taken, not by Mdme. Paoli (Tuesday's débutante), but by Mdlle. Angeri, Mr. Gye's first new-comer of the present season.

Advocates.

(From "Another World.")

I ought to mention that there are advocates selected by the State from amongst the most eloquent and able men, charged specially to bring before the proper tribunals every case where any persons, men or women, think themselves wronged. There are also able men, advocates to represent the interests of society. The former, or people's advocate, if he thinks right, advises his client by the gentlest means to desist from his cause; but if his efforts prove ineffectual, which seldom happens if he is right, he is bound to proceed with the case, and, if necessary, to bring the question before the Kings. Did there prove to be any real doubt or serious difficulty, the case would be referred even to me. The advocates of society, like the people's advocates, are disciplined in the practice of truth and justice, and if they think that there is anything in the case in favour of the appellant they are honourably bound to state it to the tribunal. This is done in the interest both of justice and of society itself, which might otherwise be injured in the person of one of its members.

Both classes of advocates occupy very high positions, and would not condescend to take fees of their clients. They are wholly remunerated by the State. They have no interest in the issue, and are equally honoured whatever the result may be, for society always gains by a just decision. HERMES.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

The annual benefit concert given by the clever pianist, Madame Eugene Oswald, took place last week in St. George's Hall, and attracted a numerous audience, evidently versed in the traditions of the classical school of pianoforte playing, for the best points in the performance of Beethoven's Trio in C minor, No. 3 of Opus 1, and in Schubert's Opus 15, were duly recognised and applauded. Having done justice to the old masters, Madame Eugene Oswald gave illustrations of the modern style of music, and introduced Liszt's transcription of the Spinnlied in Wagner's opera, Der fliegende Holländer, concluding with Chopin's brilliant Polonaise in C. Madame Oswald's merits as a pianist are too well known to need enumeration. Her concert bore testimony to her musical taste and varied accomplishments.

Schubert Society.—The second concert of this society took place at the Beethoven Rooms on Wednesday, April 2nd. The first part of the programme was devoted to Spohr's compositions; a duet for pianoforte and clarionet, well played by Herr Schuberth and Monsieur de Grandval, opening the concert. Herr Hause played a solo in his best manner; Miss Marie Arthur sang "Rose sweetly blooming," and Mdlle. Barnard, "The bird and maiden," which brought the first part to a close. A grand trio of Beethoven's opened the second part, performed by Herr Hause (pianoforte), Monsieur de Grandval (clarionet), and Herr Schuberth (violoncello), followed by a song from Signor Rocca, and a duet by Signora and Signor Danielli. Mdlle. Barnard then sang "Sleep, dearest, sleep." Herr Schuberth played a solo of his own, "Adieu et revoir," (for the first time,) which was rendered with feeling and taste, and was greatly applauded. Miss Marie Arthur, who possesses a good voice, sang "Welcome, my bonnie lad," and Signora Danielli, "Le Soir" (encored). Herr Hause brought the concert to a close by playing a solo of his own composition. The conductors were Signor Ettore Fiori and Herr Schuberth. The director must be congratulated on the large and fashionable audiences that have attended the concerts of the society.

Mdlle. Marguerite Barbier (a pupil of Mr. Aguilar), gave a matinée d'invitation on Wednesday, April the 2nd, when the following interesting programme was gone through by the young pianist, to the evident pleasure of the audience:—"Sonata in F, Mozart; Sehnsucht am Meer, Willmers; Rondo in E flat (La Gaité), Weber; a. Berceuse, b. Fantaisie (Impromptu), Chopin; Romanza, Aguilar; Sonata Quasi Fantasia ('The Moonlight'), Beethoven; Lieder ohne Worte, Mendelssohn; Fantasia on 'Mose in Egitto,' Thalberg; Arabesque, Schumann; Deuxième Valse, Mattei." The rooms were well filled, and Mdlle. Barbier played extremely well, and was consequently much and deservedly applauded, especially after a Romanza, the composition of Mr. Aguilar, and Thalberg's Fantasia on "Mose in Egitto," both of which the audience could have listened to again with pleasure had not the fatigue been too much for the young performer. The pianoforte pieces were relieved by some excellent singing by Miss Grace Lindo, who did herself infinite credit by the charming way in which she gave Beethoven's "Herz, mein Herz;" two songs by Mr. Aguilar, "Edith" and "The Appeal," and Signor Schira's "Sognai," accompanied on the pianoforte by Miss Grace Aguilar, in her most refined manner. The concert altogether gave evident pleasure to Mdlle. Barbier's friends.

Town Hall, Shoreditch.—The Lothbury Choral Society, who hold their meetings, under the direction of Mr. J. Clippingdale, in the neighbourhood of the Bank of England, gave their first concert for the season on Friday, April 14th, which was a decided success. The part-singing consisted of selections from the works of Henry Smart, J. L. Hatton, J. G. Callcott, H. Leslie, E. L. Hime, &c. The singing of Hatton's "Vesper bells are softly pealing" and "We are waiting by the river," drew forth immense applause, as did also Callcott's "True love's voice," and Hime's "For whom do roses blow" (encored). Miss Sophie Ferrari, in "I know that my Redeemer liveth," created a profound sensation by her charming singing. In a song by Mr. F. Archer, Miss Ferrari was loudly encored. Miss Bessie Randall gave "Oh rest in the Lord," and Smart's "The Lady of the Lea." Mr. Richard Latter, in Gounod's Nazareth, and a song by Tito Mattei, pleased much, and was encored. Mrs. J. Clippingdale, a pianist of merit, by her excellent performance of Sir William S. Bennett's "Geneviève" and "Rondo Piacevole," and in a solo by Sir J. Benedict, deservedly gained the approbation of all present. Mr. J. G. Callcott presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. J. Clippingdale conducted the choruses and part-songs most efficiently.

Monsieur Gustave Pradeau gave the last of three Historical Pianoforte Recitals at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, on Tuesday evening, April 8th, assisted by Mons. Sainton (violin), and Miss Julia Wigan and Miss Mary Hobbs (vocalists). The following is the programme:—"Three Songs without Words, Mendelssohn; Impromptu, Schubert (M. Gustave Pradeau); aria, 'Tho' clouds by tempests' (Der Freischütz), (Miss Julia Wigan), Weber; Sonata in C minor (piano and violin), (MM. Sainton and Gustave Pradeau), Beethoven; Duo, 'Ti veggo, t'abbraccio,' (Il Ratto di Proserpina), (Miss Julia Wigan and Miss Mary Hobbs), Winter; Sonata in D major (Op. 10), (M. Gustave Pradeau), Beethoven; solos (violin)—'Romance,' Sainton; 'Fileuse,' Lasserre, (M. Sainton); aria, 'Nobil signor' (Les Huguenots), (Miss Mary Hobbs), Meyerbeer; 'Mazurka,' 'Valse,' 'Nocturne,' 'Etude,' (M. Gustave Pradeau), Chopin; "He thinks I do not love him' (Miss Julia Wigan), Madame Sainton-Dolby; 'Nuit Blanche,' Stephen Heller; 'Absence,' G. Pradeau; 'L'oiseau prophète,' 'Au soir,' 'Novellette,' (M. Gustave Pradeau), Schumann." M. Pradeau fully justified the praise bestowed upon him at his previous performances. Miss Wigan, also, deserves to be commended for her excellent singing, and Miss Hobbs' efforts must not be passed over without due praise. M. Sainton was in "great force," and was compelled to repeat the solo by Lasserre, 'Fileuse,' which he played in perfection. Mr. Thouless, as before, was the accompanist, and performed his duties like a thorough musician.

Mrs. Montaigne's Matinée Musicale.—A performance by the amateur pianoforte pupils of this rising professor (a daughter of Mr. W. H. Holmes, the esteemed professor at the Royal Academy of Music), took place at 22, Cadogan Place, on Wednesday, April 2nd, when the following programme was gone through with credit, both to the pupils and their talented instructress:—Andante, from Sonata in G, Op. 14 (The Hon. Edith Brodrick), Beethoven; Andante and Allegro (Miss Gaussen), Mendelssohn; Three Musical Sketches—"The Mermaid," "The Wind," and "The Wave"—(Miss Steains), S. Heller; Sonata, in B flat, Op. 22 (Minuetto and Rondo) (Miss Evelyn Wood), Beethoven; Pastorale, Field; La Babillarde, Loeffler (The Hon. Helen Brodrick); Consolation (Miss M. Scovell), Dussek; "Holyrood," Danse de la Cour du temps de Marie Stuart (The Hon. Albinia Brodrick), Brocca; Duet, "Three Diversions" (The Hon. Helen and the Hon. Edith Brodrick), Sir W. Sterndale Bennett; Prelude and Fugue, in B flat (Miss Evelyn Wood), Bach; Lieder ohne Worte (No. 6, Book V.) (Miss Dancer), Mendelssohn; Geraldine, Mudie; "Where the bee sucks," transcribed by O'Leary (The Hon. Edith Brodrick); Sonata, in D (Miss Oldman), Mozart; Menuet célèbre de L. Boccherini (The Hon. Albinia Brodrick); Valse (Miss Evelyn Wood), Chopin. The select and fashionable audience who assembled on the occasion were evidently gratified by the performances of the young ladies, who entered con amore into the spirit of the compositions entrusted to them.

PROVINCIAL.

Blackburn.—Mr. T. S. Hayward, the accomplished organist of the Blackburn Parish Church, gave, in the Exchange Assembly Rooms, his third pianoforte recital. The artistes included Miss Mary Thorley, of the Manchester Concerts; Mr. J. Tuke, vicar-choral of Lichfield Cathedral; Mr. Henry Hayward, Mr. T. S. Hayward, and Mr. H. H. Jones, organist of St. Peter's Church; who all exerted themselves to the satisfaction of the audience. "The Wanderer," was rendered with a good deal of vigour by Mr. Tuke. Mr. Henry Hayward's solos upon the violin elicited hearty applause. Miss Thorley, who is a great favourite in Blackburn, sang "O bid your faithful Ariel fly," and delighted every one. She was enthusiastically recalled, and then gave another favourite song. Thalberg and De Beriot's grand duo, Les Huguenots, for the violin and piano, by Mr. H. Hayward and Mr. T. S. Hayward, was a brilliant and artistic performance, and richly deserved the applause with which it was greeted. Some duets by Miss Thorley, Mr. Tuke and Mr. T. Parkinson, were given with ability and taste. Altogether, writes a local journal, the concert passed off most successfully, and we congratulate Mr. Hayward upon the efficiency of the performers and upon the ability and zeal he has displayed in promoting the concerts, but we regret that the support of the musical public of Blackburn has not been commensurate with the high character of the performances.

Frankfort-on-the-Maine.—The twelfth, and last, of the series of Museum Concerts was of a somewhat varied character. There were two orchestral pieces: Herr C. Reinecke's overture to König Manfred, and Beethoven's Eroica, both admirably performed, under the direction of Herr C. Müller. There was no solo-singing, but some of the members of the Cecilia Union gave six compositions by Brahms, Hauptmann, Mendelssohn, and Schumann. "Virtuosity" was represented by Mons. C. Davidoff, violoncellist, from St. Petersburg. He played several pieces, including two by himself. He met with a cordial reception, both as virtuoso and composer.

Weimar.—Goethe's Singspiel, or piece interspersed with songs, Jery et Bately, with music by Mdme. Ingeborg von Bronsart, will be shortly produced.

Organ News.—The grand new organ for Gloucester Cathedral will be placed on the screen. The Dean and chapter have entrusted the work to Messrs. Bryceson and Co., of London, and the instrument will be specially arranged for conducting either choir or nave services in a very complete manner.

COLONEL MAPLESON'S IMPROVED MILITARY TENT.

(Communicated.)

The spirited impresario, of Her Majesty's Opera (Drury Lane) has not confined his energies to the management of Italian Opera, but has earned success on a wider and more stirring field. For some years he has been Lieutenant-Colonel of the North-east London Volunteers, and has devoted considerable time to the furtherance of the Volunteer movement. Recently he has turned his attention to the invention of a new military tent, to replace the Bell tent and Officer's marquee, too well known for their many disadvantages in actual use. Colonel Mapleson's invention, (which is to be shown in this year's International Exhibition, at South Kensington,) claims to possess over the present tents advantages at once apparent, even to non-military men, who have never experienced the drawbacks of the field-tents for the army and volunteers. The most important features are:—

1st. The facility with which the Mapleson tent can be pitched and struck, one man being able to perform this duty in a few minutes. The Bell tent usually takes six men about twenty minutes to fix, and if the pole be lost, and it is kept detached, it cannot be fixed at all. The marquee in the same operation occupies eight men about half-an-hour.

2nd. The inconvenience to tent-lines is obviated, for, by removing the pin which supports the traveller on the standard pole, the arms are allowed to drop, which instantly slackens the tent, thus allowing for shrinkage to the canvas in wet weather; and the necessity of having to go outside the tent to slacken the tent-lines is overcome. The arrangement of having two sides to open and allow a current of air to pass through, one of the sides capable of extension and supported by two poles, thus forming a verandah, with a screen or sunshade to attach on either side, as may be most convenient for shade, whilst the roof is almost opaque, is a "desideratum," as all who have lived during hot weather in the field tents used by our Army can testify.

The external appearance of this tent may at first appear small, but, being square, it is capable of accommodating a larger number of persons than might be supposed. The principle can be applied to much larger tents. One of the most important elements of comfort during camp life is a well-ventilated tent when closed for the night or in stormy weather. This point has been fully considered in the improved tent. The mode of fastening or closing it is also improved, for by means of D pieces and lacing lines the doorways or sides are securely shut, and can at all times be readily opened, because hooks and eyes, buckles and straps, are found inconvenient in cold or wet weather. This tent, with its pole, bag of pins, mallet, canvas screen or shade, is readily placed in a valise which laces up (a great improvement upon the bag used by the army), and forms one convenient package; consequently there can be no possibility of the pole getting detached from the tent during transit—an arrangement of great importance in active service. The Mapleson military tent when packed weighs 83 lbs., a trifle heavier than the circular Bell tent, and considerably lighter than the field Officers' marquee.

REVIEWS.

Duff & Stewart.

Thoughts of Heaven (Aspiration). Sacred song. Words by Mrs. M. A. Baines. Composed by Berthold Tours.

This song is preceded by a brief recitative, the raison d'être of which we do not exactly see. The melody of the song itself is simple and pleasing, qualities which belong also to the accompaniment, wherein Mr. Tours's good taste and skill are agreeably conspicuous. In families which affect sacred music "Thoughts of Heaven" should become a favourite.

Lamborn Cock.

Oh! Come Again, Sweet Love, in May. Duet. Words by Mrs. M. A. Baines. Music by Berthold Tours.

That this duet will make its way among amateur vocalists a single glance at it is enough to show. The parts are tuneful, and the ensemble is very pleasing. Mr. Tours should be congratulated upon his accompaniment, which cannot fail to please, as a distinctive and important feature of the whole.

Chappell & Co.

Minuetto from Beethoven's String Quartet in A major (Op. 18). Transcribed for the Pianoforte by Berthold Tours.

How many who have heard and admired this movement at the Monday Popular Concerts will welcome it in a shape adapted for home use? Transcriptions are not, of course, as good as the things transcribed, in their original form, but they are of excellent service, nevertheless; and Mr. Tours, who knows how to do his work well, should add a host of them to the repertory of the household instrument.

Scherzo from Beethoven's String Quartet in G major (Op. 18). Transcribed for the Pianoforte by Berthold Tours.

Here is another charming movement from the great master's early quartets, charmingly arranged. Let no pianist of classical taste omit to procure it.

So the Children Say. Song. Words by R. Reece. Music by Berthold Tours.

Mr. Tours always writes like a musician of taste and skill; and in the song before us these qualities are prominently shown. The music is simple, but its simplicity is of the sort which makes more effect than pretentiousness. Appropriately delivered—that is to say, in an earnest, unaffected manner—it could not fail to please.

Go, Lovely Rose. Song. Words by Edmund Waller. Music by Alfred Piatti.

This well-written and thoughtful song has already made its mark in connection with the Monday Popular Concerts. We need, therefore, do no more than state that an inspection of the music confirms the popular judgment of its merits. Few songs of the present day are more clearly marked by musicianly skill, and that right perception which enable a composer to place himself thoroughly in harmony with the poet.

O, Swallow, Swallow! Song, with violoncello obbligato. Poetry by Tennyson. Music by Alfred Piatti.

Here we have another Monday Popular Concert success, the song having been sung in St. James's Hall, with unvarying good fortune, by Mr. Santley, to the perfectly played obbligato of the composer. The remarks made upon "Go, lovely rose," apply with equal force to the piece before us. A more charmingly conceived and ably written song is rarely produced. For home use the 'cello obbligato might be played with adequate effect upon the harmonium.

Novello, Ewer & Co.

Songs. Composed by Robert Schumann. Edited, and in part translated, by Natalia Macfarren.

This handsome volume is the first of a series which will contain Schumann's songs in the order of their production, omitting the "Narrative Songs" and some few others. The instalment before us includes nine pieces known as Op. 24, twenty-six classed under the general name "Myrthen" (Op. 25), and having the connecting link of a slight story, four known as Op. 27, and two as Op. 30. Criticism of the works themselves would be superfluous. It is enough that they are the works of Schumann, a composer sufficiently great to command respectful attention, and to make a knowledge of his music obligatory. As regards the edition, Mrs. Macfarren gives an assurance that the text of the composer is "absolutely followed" save that "a very few evident oversights in the original editions have been amended with the sanction of Madame Schumann." The delicate task of adapting English words to the music must have given Mrs. Macfarren some trouble, but it has been, on the whole, well done. In cases where Schumann set music to German translations of English poetry, the music has properly received prior consideration, and hence considerable changes in the text of Burns and other writers. These changes may be matter of regret from the poet's point of view, but there was no help for them. Either the music or the verses had to undergo alteration, and, as the former could not be touched, the latter were necessarily sacrificed.

Cramer & Co.

Spinning Song, from Wagner's opera, Der fliegende Hollander (The Flying Dutchman). Arranged for the pianoforte by Jules Brissac.

The believers in the so-called "Music of the Future" may welcome the arrangement before us as a fair challenge to the assertion that Herr Wagner is incapable of writing a melody. The somewhat protracted "spinning scene" in his opera of Der fliegende Hollander (given in London under the Italian title L'Ollandese Dannato), contains much that is animated and rhythmical. From this M. Brissac has chosen his themes with great judgment, and, in distributing the passages for the pianoforte, has done all that was necessary to facilitate their execution, and thus enhance their effect. The simulation of the motion of the spinning-wheel is well sustained without interfering with the interest of the cantilena, and the result is a brilliant piece, of moderate difficulty, in M. Brissac's best manner.

A celebrated singer, Madame Le Rochois, was giving a younger companion in art some instruction in the tragic character of Medea, which she was about to sustain.—"Inspire yourself with the situation," said she; "fancy yourself in the poor woman's place. If you were deserted by a lover whom you adored, what would you do?" The reply was as unexpected as it was ingenious—"I should look out for another."

FIDDLING UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

A Southern paper relates the snagging of a steamboat with the owner on board, who was very fond of playing on the violin. The captain, pilot, and engineer were in the cabin playing cards one day, when her bow struck a snag with a force that knocked a hole in her side as big as a hogshead. The shock upset the faro bank and those gathered around it, and caused a general confusion and consternation among all except the owner, who, having righted himself in his chair, re-commenced his tune where he had left off, and went on as though nothing had happened.

"She's sinking," shouted an Arkansas man, dressed in a hickory-bark coat, who was making his way out of the cabin with a pair of saddle-bags on his arm. "Tomahawk me if she ain't sinking, sure."

The owner heard it, but fiddled away as unconcerned as Nero at the burning of Rome. "Three feet of water in the hold!—Run, old Buzzard, ashore if you can," shouted the captain. The startling words reached the ears of the owner, but he continued to saw away.

The passengers ran to him and bawled out, "Do you know the boat is snagged?"

"I suspected something of the kind," coolly answered the owner, as he laid his left ear on the violin, à la Ole Bull, and appeared perfectly enchanted with his own strains.

"She'll be lost in five minutes," continued the passengers.

"She's been a losing concern these five years," replied the owner, as he drew most excruciating tones from his fiddle.

"I can feel her settle," said a passenger.

"I wish she would settle with me for what I've lost by her, before she goes down," was the owner's reply, as his hand moved backward and forward over the fiddle.

"But why don't you speak to the captain, and give him orders what to do in this emergency?" asked the good-natured passengers.

"Interfering with the officers of this boat is a very delicate matter," meekly remarked the owner, as he still sawed away.

The boat careened over, the next moment the cabin was half full of water.

The Buzzard, together with her cargo and machinery, proved a total loss. The officers, crew, and passengers saved themselves by means of a yawl; the owner swam ashore with his fiddle under his right arm and the bow in his mouth. No insurance.

WAIFS.

Mr. Maretzek's Lenten season at the Academy of Music concludes today, with a matinée performance of Der Freischütz. Faust was repeated on Monday evening, and La Favorita on Wednesday. Last evening Lucca appeared for the first time here, as Marie, in La Figlia del Reggimento. She will bid farewell to New York, in the same opera, next Monday evening. Tuesday evening is set apart for the benefit of Miss Kellogg, who will appear as Gilda, in Rigoletto. Mr. Maretzek has engaged Lucca for another year, and it is reported that he has also secured Ilma di Murska for next season.—"New York Dramatic World," March 22.

Nilsson is going to do lots of things in lots of places. According to paragraphs floating around, she is at the same time to sing in St. Petersburgh, Madrid, going to New York city to live in winter, and to build a summer house in Illinois.—American.

"Papa, didn't you whip me once for biting Tommy?"—"Yes, my child; and you hurt him very much."—"Well, then, papa, you ought to whip sister's music teacher, too; he bit sister yesterday afternoon right on the mouth, and I know it hurt her, because she put her arms around his neck and tried to choke him."

Master Harry Walker (pianoforte medallist of the Royal Academy of Music), the clever young pupil of Mr. F. Bowen Jewson, had the honour of playing before their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, at Mr. Gladstone's on Saturday evening last. Master Walker is only eleven years of age, and shows already remarkable talent as a pianist.

A countryman came to one of our hotels and wrote after his name "P.O.P.S.F.C." Here was a title which none but himself understood. "Pray, my dear sir," asked the bar-keeper, "what do all these letters stand for?" "Stand for! why, that's my title." "Yes sir—but what is your title?" "Why, Professor of Psalmody and School-master from Connecticut."

Probably the oldest living organist in the country, if not in the world, is Mr. S. P. Taylor, residing at 469, Carlton Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y. This venerable musician was born in England in 1778, and is, therefore, 94 years of age. He played an organ in church when only fourteen years of age—80 years ago. He came to this country when a young man, and some 60 years ago was appointed organist at St. Paul's Chapel, New York.—American Paper.

On Wednesday evening, during the season, there is generally a concert, besides other music, going on. On Wednesdays, also, the House of Commons is usually engaged in discussing a liquor law, or some other preposterous measure, proposed by an honourable fanatic. Shouts of "Sing!" are sometimes heard on these occasions, but nobody attempts to, and thus the harmony of the evening is undisturbed. Though quavers are absent from Wednesday's debate, the attention of the House is so often devoted to a crotchet, that Wednesday might as well be called Crotchet Day in the House of Commons.—Punch.

Madame Trebelli-Bettini appears to have been most ungenerously used by her countrymen, according to a story which comes from Florence. The Pagliano Theatre had engaged Madame Trebelli and her husband, much to the annoyance of the manager of a rival opera house, who had been unable to secure them. The latter, determined to spoil the rival's success, bought up every available seat in the house on the first night, and on Madame Trebelli's entrance as Leonora in La Favorita, she was saluted with a perfect storm of hisses and cat-calls. Madame Trebelli bravely went through to the end, but the next day broke off her engagement, and wrote an indignant letter to the Nazione, complaining of the mean conduct of her husband's countrymen.

"Signorina" Trafford, a native of Liverpool, who has received her musical education at the Milan Conservatoire, and has for nearly three years been distinguishing herself in an operatic tour, as prima donna assoluta, at Nice, Trieste, Palermo, Milan, Madrid, &c., sang recently at the morning and evening services in St. Peter's choir, Seel Street, with which she was associated as leading singer before taking to the operatic stage. Her voice is a pure soprano of great range and strength, especially effective in the upper register; and her rendering of the sacred solos yesterday quite bore out the encomiums of the critical Italian papers on her executive facility and artistic success in opera. After her brief vacation in Liverpool she returns to Italy, commencing a six months tour in Ferrara, and will afterwards fulfil engagements at Cairo, Paris, and St. Petersburg.—Liverpool Daily Post.

The daily papers are already commencing to give Mr. Strakosch's programme for the next season's opera, and to dwell with complacency upon a list of names embracing Nilsson, Capoul, Miss Cary; Campanini (the London tenor), Mdlle. Torriani, and a young singer named Bonfratelli. Alas, that managerial promises should so often resemble pie-crust in being made only to be broken. During the summer, we shall, of course, have stories concerning the sumptuous scenery preparing for the Academy, and gorgeous costumes. Mr. Strakosch already announces Arditi as his conductor, and Aida and Lohengrin among the operas to be produced. Still, we will not judge before the event, but wait to see whether the manager is merely "flying kites" or intends doing what he says.—Arcadian.

Applause is the due of every actor and actress who does his or her work faithfully and well, and it should be bestowed not only judiciously but liberally. Applause is almost the life blood of artists. It is to them what the warmth of the sun is to the flower. It conveys to them the gratifying fact that their labours are meeting with due appreciation, and it becomes an incentive to loftier efforts. A dull and lifeless audience has a depressing effect upon those on the stage, whereas the effect of a spirited and appreciative audience is just the reverse. It is but a poor reward to the artist, yet after all it is a gratifying one, and we know that the artist is always grateful for it. Do let our audiences be a little warmer, and they will find the return in increased efforts to please.—Boston Evening Traveller.

The Musical Education Committee of the Society of Arts held a meeting at Clarence House on Thursday, the 3rd inst., present:—H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh, in the chair; Mr. Henry Cole, C.B., Mr. A. S. Cole, Major Donnelly, R.E., Lord Gerald Fitzgerald, Mr. C. J. Freake, Sir John Harrington, Bart., Mr. Chandos Wren Hoskyns, M.P., Mr. Frank Morrison, Mr. J. F. Puttick, Mr. Samuel Redgrave, Mr. Seymour Teulon, and Mr. E. Carleton Tufnell, with Mr. Le Neve Foster, Secretary. The Committee were of opinion that it was desirable to erect a building at a cost not exceeding £20,000, suitable for the purposes of a Training School for Music in connection with the Society of Arts, and it was referred to a sub-committee to consider on what terms and on what conditions such sum could most readily be raised.

The Neapolitans are now in a greater state of excitement than could have been produced by any political event, and that is the successful performance of Aida on Sunday last. San Carlo was crowded from top to bottom, though prices had been nearly doubled. The scenery was magnificent. Mesdames Stolz and Waldmann surpassed themselves. Patterno and Collini gave boundless satisfaction, and the whole house seemed to have been driven to a frenzy of delight. As to Verdi, whose great object in visiting Naples was to superintend the performance of Aida, he was called before the curtain twenty-eight times, or, as some will have it, thirty-five times. Meantime, the receipts of the evening are stated to have been 14,500 lire. The 30th of March, 1873, will mark an epoch in the history of the Lyric Theatre of Naples.—Times.

After the Opera, an interesting event took place at the residence of Madame Lucca, in Fourteenth Street, near Fifth Avenue. This was a serenade by the band of the 11th Regiment, N. G., S. N. Y. The street was lined, and the space in front of the house filled with citizens anxious to get a peep at the prima donna. At half-past eleven the strains of martial music were heard on the damp air, and the band, followed by a company of the regiment, and preceded by the drum corps, made its appearance. After countermarching they took up a position before the lady's domicile and played a selection of appropriate airs, ending with Die Wacht am Rhein. Madame Lucca hereupon made her appearance at the balcony, carefully muffled up, and bowed and waved her handkerchief amid loud and long-continued cheering. She chatted gaily with her friends on the balcony while the band repeated the German war song.—Arcadian.

A meeting of the renters of the Theatre Royal Drury Lane was held on Tuesday in the saloon of the theatre, under the presidency of Captain Sharpe, for the purpose of considering a proposal from Mr. Mapleson, respecting the accommodation of renters, nominees, and life admission holders, during the forthcoming opera season. Mr. James Robins, secretary of the renters' committee, read the proposals made by Mr. Mapleson, which were, that every night during the opera season 24 pit stalls in the front row should be reserved, until the drawing up of the curtain, for renters or their nominees, stall tickets to be delivered out each night to renters in the order which they may be applied for, and evening dress indispensable. In addition 16 seats would be set apart for renters in the second row of the dress circle, and 17 seats in the third row. The chairman said he considered the proposal of Mr. Mapleson a very liberal one. He was aware that some thought otherwise, but they should recollect that by Mr. Mapleson opening the theatre for an opera season, the value of their property was largely increased, and it would not be judicious for them to drive too hard a bargain. The proposal was accepted.

An English vocal party has been giving concerts in Germany and Holland with success. At Cologne (Prussia) they were especially welcomed. A local journal writes as follows:—

"In former days there was a custom here that foreign artists who wished to be presented before the public had to undergo a rehearsal of their personal talent before the musical society of the city. At the present time this tradition is somewhat forgotten, but was lately re-established by an English society. The quartets and duets performed by the Misses P. and J. Siedle, Messrs. Pearson and Melbourne were so exceptionally satisfying that we did not hesitate to recommend their concerts, which, we are sorry, however, were not well attended, owing to the performance of Lohengrin at the theatre. These artists, who sing together, with real artistic expression, concerted as well as solo pieces, proved to come of a good school, and we do not hesitate to recommend them to the attention of the public."—V. P.

It is said that the poet Moore, one night, while stopping at an inn in Scotland, was continually troubled by the landlady with the request that he should write her epitaph. Accordingly, at night, he gave an impromptu as follows:—

"Good Susan Blake, in royal state, Arrived at last at Heaven's gate——" and stopped, promising to finish it in the morning. The good lady was in a transport at this inscription, and treated Mr. Moore with every possible attention. In the morning he was about leaving, when the lady reminded him he had not finished the epitaph. "That is so," said he, and immediately added:—

"But Peter met her with a club,
And knocked her back to Beelzebub."

It is said that Mr. Moore's horses were in motion just as he had finished the last line.

Brass Bands.—The Saturday Review is of opinion that "it is becoming very difficult to know what course elderly gentlemen who are anxious not to have their wills disputed had better follow with regard to organ-grinders and brass bands. A few weeks ago half a dozen mad doctors went into the witness-box in the Probate Court to declare that an old gentleman, who was in the habit of swearing at itinerant musicians when they played under his window at Ramsgate, must necessarily have been mad and quite incapable of making a will. But happily the Judge did not agree with them, and the will was upheld. This week we have had another case in the same Court, in which a testator's partiality for German bands was adduced as conclusive proof of his insanity—an argument in which the jury appears to have fully concurred, and to which we may ourselves venture to add our cordial and emphatic assent. It is no doubt satisfactory to find that these decisions are in accordance with the common sense of mankind, but it is not the less startling and uncomfortable to observe that, whether a man curses or encourages brass bands, professional evidence is equally forthcoming to show that it is an infallible indication of insanity."

Dr. Heinemann, F.R.G.S., Principal of the London Civil Service and Military College, delivered, last Friday, a lecture at the Crystal Palace School of Art, on "Albert Durer and Holbein." In the course of his lecture, which was full of interesting and important details as to the career and works of the two masters, Dr. Heinemann remarked that the date of Holbein's birth must have been 1496-97, about ten years later than usually believed. It is commonly assumed that Holbein painted the Dance of Death at Basle, which is a mistake; nor did he paint the Dance of the Dominicans at Berne. Referring to Holbein's well-known portrait of Anne of Cleves, he said that the romance connected with it—viz., that King Henry VIII's minister, Cromwell, should have lost his head because Holbein represented Lady Anne in his portrait to be a beauty, seemed to him a mere absurdity. Did Henry make a promise of marriage on the mere sight of a portrait? Most of the biographies of Holbein are full of myths. The famous "Madonna" in Dresden seems to be a copy or duplicate, and Darmstadt may be proud in possessing the original. In his remarks on Durer, the lecturer observed, among other things, that Durer's wife did not seem to have been that quarrelsome, avaricious, "reckoning mistress" as was commonly represented. The lecture was illustrated by some original engravings from the collection of Mr. James Anderson, which the latter gentleman kindly placed at the lecturer's disposal.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine, (Longman & Co.,) they are strongly recommended at pages 372 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from, Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. PREFACE.

No country possesses more good voices than England, and many voices would be a fortune to their owners if they knew how to use them.

Vocal Exercises, however, are much neglected, owing, in a great measure, to their monotony of passage and of style.

The object of these Studies is to make practice as attractive as possible, and the Waltz form has therefore been chosen for its liveliness.

A selection has been made of passages best suited to give flexibility to the voice, and the six Waltzes here presented contain the germs of a thorough method of vocal practice.

The Italian language is preferred on account of the openness of the vowels; but these studies can be used advantageously without words, by simply "vocalising" on the vowel A (pronounced in Italian, Ah.)

Commas (,) are placed where breath is to be taken. At first, however, pupils should practise each study very slowly, and draw breath whenever found necessary.

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA.

SEASON 1873.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

MR. MAPLESON has the honour to announce to the Subscribers and Patrons of HER MAJESTY'S OPERA that the SEASON will begin on ## TUESDAY, 15th APRIL, 1873.

The performances will again be given in the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, which has been found perfectly adapted for Operatic representations.

It will be seen from the accompanying Prospectus that the Director has been so fortunate as to secure the services of all the established favourites of former Seasons. During the recess the Director has personally devoted much time and attention to making engagements with New Artists, who are worthy, he feels satisfied, of being presented to the Patrons of Her Majesty's Opera, and whose acknowledged merits are such as to justify him in confidently subjecting them to this severe ordeal. The list of these new appearances, it will be noticed, embraces a complete and efficient double company, which, by itself, would do honour to any Lyric Establishment in Europe. The Director need hardly point out that this really forms a new era in the annals of Opera in this Country. The great advantages to be derived from these special arrangements are apparent. The Director will thus be enabled to present many of our standard Operas with casts entirely new, and at the same time to make preparation for bringing out new works for the principal members of the former staff, who will besides reappear in their well-known parts. The Director feels satisfied that the great variety and novelty thus imparted to the Season will make it one of the most interesting and attractive in the whole history of Opera in London.

It will be noticed that the Director has determined upon producing "MIGNON" and "FAVORITA" for the first time, under his management, and also the posthumous work, "IL TALISMANO," by our countryman, M. W. BALFE. Drury Lane Theatre was the scene of the great triumphs of this talented Composer, and it was his last wish that this work should be first performed in the scene of these former successes. The Director has unqualified pleasure in being enabled to accede to this desire of a distinguished musician, whom any country would gladly claim as its own. This important event will doubtless give a special interest and eclat to the Season. Sir MICHAEL COSTA has kindly consented to superintend the production of this great work, which is a sufficient guarantee that it will be perfect in all its details.

MADAME CHRISTINE NILSSON.

The Director begs to announce that this peerless Artist will again appear before those audiences who in former Seasons have so fully appreciated her rare talents. Since the close of the London Season, those who take an interest in Continental Operatic matters will have noticed the enormous success Madame NILSSON has commanded, despite all opposing factions, at Moscow and at St. Petersburg. It forms an unprecedented chapter in the annals of the Lyric Drama; and the fact that she has completely established herself as the star of the fastidious Russians, indisputably places this Artist foremost in public estimation. Madame Nilsson, in addition to appearing in her well-known parts, will undertake the role of Mignon, and will create the character of Edith Plantagenet, in Balfe's new Opera, Il Talismano.

MDLLE. CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG.

This favourite Artist, at the close of the Season, returned to America, where she has renewed her former triumphs; and, if possible, more firmly attached to herself the admiration of her countrymen. Mdlle. KELLOGG will appear during the month of June.

MDLLE. ILMA DI MURSKA.

Mdlle. DI MURSKA, whom the Director had the gratification of first presenting to a London audience, has been re-engaged, and will appear, after an absence of two years, in those parts which have won for her the esteem of a large circle of admirers.

MADAME TREBELLI-BETTINI.

The Director feels pleasure in being able to include this great Artist's name in the list. Her services, in connection with the perfect rendering of many of our greatest Operas, have become simply indispensable.

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA—Continued.

MDLLE. TIETJENS.

There are many Operas containing the noblest characters in the Lyric Drama which must either be omitted from the repertoire of any establishment, or only imperfectly rendered, unless Mdlle. TIETJENS is a member of the company. Amongst those characters which she holds undisputed may be cited Norma, Lucrezia, Semiramide, Medea, La Contessa in Mozart's Nozze, Donna Anna, Valentina in Les Huguenots, and Fidelio. In fine, Mdlle. Tietjens is recognised by all competent authorities as the legitimate successor of that brilliant line of great tragediennes, Pasta, Malibran, and Grisi.

SIGNOR MONGINI.

This great Tenor has been specially engaged to interpret such important parts as Otello, Raoul, &c., for which his qualifications so eminently fit him.

SIGNOR CAMPANINI.

The position, as our first Tenor, which this Artist at once commanded for himself last Season, is the surest test of the great powers he possesses. During the recess, Signor CAMPANINI has been in Italy, taking the rest which is essential to the continued strength and purity of a Tenor voice. He may be expected to come back to us, therefore, with renewed freshness and brilliancy. In addition to the characters he appeared in last Season, he will undertake the roles of Raoul, Faust, &c.

ENGAGEMENTS.

Mdme. CHRISTINE NILSSON, Mdlle. ALWINA VALLERIA (of La Scala, Milano—her first appearance), Mdlle. OSTAVA TORRIANI (of La Fenice, Venezia, and Theatre Italien, Paris—her first appearance), Mdlle. CARLOTTA GROSSI, and Mdlle. ILMA DI MURSKA (her first appearance these two years), Mdlle. CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG, Mdme. TREBELLI-BETTINI, Mdlle. JUSTINE MACVITZ, (of the Opera, Trieste—her first appearance,) Mdlle. BAUERMEISTER, Mdlle. MARIE ROZE, and Mdlle. TIETJENS.

THE ORCHESTRA AND CHORUS.—The ensembles of Drury Lane, under the command of Sir MICHAEL COSTA, have been universally acknowledged as the most perfect of the day. This gratifying result, one of vital importance in every Operatic representation, is due to the unsurpassed talents and untiring care of our greatest Conductor. The Chorus for the coming Season has been numerically strengthened, and is now composed of members specially selected from the principal Opera Houses of Barcelona, Milan, Turin, Genoa, and St. Petersburg. The Orchestra has undergone some important changes, and, it is expected, will be found to surpass that of any other Lyric Establishment in Europe. These essential departments have again been placed under the absolute control of Sir MICHAEL COSTA, who has personally superintended the changes and additions referred to.

Maestro al Piano, Signor LI CALSI; Assistant Accompanyist, Mr. F. COWEN; First Violin and Soloist, Mons. SAINTON; Chorus Master, Mr. SMYTHSON; Organist, Mr. WILLING; The Military Band of the Coldstream Guards, under the direction of Mr. F. GODFREY; Suggeritore, Signor RIALP.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. VAN PRAAG.

MR. VAN PRAAG, who has been for many years past well known to the members of the Musical Profession, and the public, as holding a responsible position at the principal Concert-rooms of the West End, is now, in his 74th year. In addition to his failing health and strength, he has also recently become a widower, and is, by this sad bereavement, left alone, with not a relative in England to aid or take care of him. He has children in California who wish him to go out to them, and it is his own desire, notwithstanding his age and infirmities, to do so. Want of means for undertaking so long and expensive a journey, which his children are unable to supply, however, preclude the possibility of his leaving England. Under these circumstances, a few friends, well able to bear witness to his respectability, honesty, and courtesy in the discharge of the duties he has so "well and worthily fulfilled," are anxious to raise a Subscription in his behalf, to which contributions are earnestly and respectfully requested.

"ANOTHER WORLD."*

(From the "Pall Mall Gazette.")

The author of this work warns readers very emphatically against classing it with other works of the same kind. We are not to regard it as a new Utopia, as a second Erewhon, but are to accept it as an account from actual experience, or at least actual knowledge, of a Star world which exists. Every author who puts forth a narrative of life or travels in an imaginary sphere is obliged to make similar assurances. Often much ingenuity is shown in explaining the means by which the information concerning the imaginary sphere has come to hand, but the writer with whom we have now to deal does not stoop to ingenuity, and contents himself with earnest assertion. The author, or "editor," as he prefers to call himself, frankly admits that if he were to attempt to explain, he would further, in due consistency, be bound to explain his explanation; and that thus the reader would only see "one enigma solved by another apparently more insoluble than itself." Like the champions of Biblical inspiration, he maintains that the genuineness of his "fragments" is sufficiently proved by internal evidence; and that of two difficulties it will be less difficult to look upon them as revelations from "another world" than as the product of human invention. All this is very clever, but does not alter the fact that "Another World," like all the books which its author will not allow that it resembles, is an account of an ideal system of society in which many of the arrangements are very admirable, and some exceedingly droll. Others, again, are neither good, bad, nor amusing, but simply fantastic, without any sort of significance. Lovers, for instance, in the Star city of Montalluyah, address the loved ones in a style which seems to have been suggested partly by the Song of Solomon, partly by Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. "Soft as the Kamouska," sings the superior young man of Montalluyah to the idol of his heart, "thine eyes penetrate and search the soul with the ingenuity exercised by Orestes to find a treasure. Sweet as the milk of the Meleeta is thy breath. Thy breasts are like the electricity of Turvee," and so on.

Though ample information is furnished on the subject of love-making and marriage ceremonies among the inhabitants of Montalluyah, we are not told to what extent the privileges known in our own mundane sphere as "women's rights" have been introduced in the Star city. It is true that health, morals, and new applications of scientific discoveries are the things chiefly cared for in "another world;" and as every one is good, and consequently happy, laws are scarcely necessary, and legislation altogether out of the question. If women, then, have no political functions assigned to them in Montalluyah, that is probably owing to the fact that in that happy realm there are no political functions for them to perform. But they possess one notable advantage over the women of this world—they choose their own husbands, and are allowed three distinct opportunities of picking one out from a collection of no fewer than eighty-five young men. The young men are such good young men in Montalluyah that the notion of one of them rejecting a young lady's proffered hand does not seem, as a matter for serious consideration, to have struck the "Tootmanyoso," to whose genius the laws and customs of the Star city are due.† As all the women in Montalluyah are beautiful and amiable, it may be thought impossible that out of eighty-five marrying men at least one would not be found ready to accept any candidate for matrimony of the opposite sex who might present herself. But what guarantee could there be that the particular individual so offering himself would be acceptable to the would-be bride?‡ In a cotillon, for a temporary partner, the mode of choice invented by the "Tootmanyoso" for marriage would and does answer; but it seems inapplicable to long and serious engagements. As there are no ill-assorted unions in Montalluyah, as all love-making takes place openly and according to regulation, and as "irregularities," whether before or after marriage, are absolutely unknown, it follows that one great source of dramatic complications is wanting in the Star world.

Nor, apart from a few humorous incidents which might easily be developed from the customs attendant on the choice of a husband, can we see much scope for comedy in the lovely but monotonous life of Montalluyah. The very notion of evil, except as comparatively imperfect good, will in due time, no doubt, disappear from the place. But some traditions on the subject, though not enough for stage purposes, seem still to be maintained; and in the girls' schools it is, we are sorry to learn, found necessary to keep the young ladies apart, lest they should converse on "inconvenient" subjects. Hideous sounds, too, produced from gongs constructed for the purpose, are heard every morning in their sleeping chambers, the noise being continued until, throwing aside their "naturally luxurious" habits, they spring from their beds and silence the well-worked alarums. If it were known of a young lady that she had a tendency to talk on "inconvenient" subjects, and that she could not be got out of bed otherwise than by the loud reverberation of an inharmonious gong, her chances of persuading one out of even so large a number as eighty-five young men to marry her would, we should think, be seriously diminished.

Nevertheless, women are instructed in the art of pleasing, and are "required to attend to their personal appearance abroad and at home." As much probably is expected of the men, only what is considered pleasing in Montalluyah would be thought less so in England. Under the head of "Gentleman's Costume" we read that "gloves are not worn by men, but their trousers being so massive they can place their hands in the ample folds when walking in the sun." This, in plain English, means that in Montalluyah gentlemen do not wear gloves, and that they walk about with their hands in their pockets. The ladies are more refined; and we are assured, àpropos of a ball room custom of "choosing by hands," that "ladies are very particular about their hands, and, as may easily be conceived, give them a little extra attention before going to a party."

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

A very few words may describe the performance of La Favorita, one of the incidents of last week. The new comer, Madame Paoli, has decided ability, and, on the whole, made a very good impression. But to sustain, even creditably, the character of Leonora is by no means an easy task. It has been essayed by many of the most renowned lyric artists: from Rosina Stoltz—accepted by Donizetti as its original representative—to Grisi, and from Grisi to Madame Pauline Lucca, who owns, in a degree unsurpassed by any predecessor or contemporary, the qualifications of person, voice, and histrionic genius indispensable to its poetic embodiment. To compare Madame Paoli with any of these would be alike unjust to them and to herself. Nevertheless, as we have hinted, she has unquestionable merit. She made a strong impression in the duet with Fernando, which, though weakened by her somewhat laboured, if not altogether ineffective, delivery of the air, "O mio Fernando," with its brilliant sequel, was strengthened and confirmed by her entire performance in the last and most striking scene of the opera—that of the meeting between Leonora and her lover in the cloisters, which culminates in the death of the unhappy heroine. As an actress, Madame Paoli seems a little cold and reserved; but in this particular scene she gave signs of intelligence and true dramatic feeling. That she is well versed in the business of the stage was clear in every situation of importance—having said which we have no more to add. The Fernando, or Ferdinando ("les deux se disent"), of Signor Nicolini requires no new description. In more than one respect it resembles the inimitable assumption by Mario of that very ill-treated personage; and when Signor Nicolini has made himself as thorough a master of climax as that greatest of lyric comedians he will approach still nearer to the beau idéal. In the finale of the third act, where Fernando resents the indignity put upon him by the courtiers and throws both his honours and his broken sword at the feet of the offending Sovereign, his declamation and his acting were alike forcible. But Signor Nicolini should husband his resources—if only because they are exceptional and deserve the husbanding. The sensation of the evening was naturally created by the first appearance of M. Faure, always a singer and actor of mark, but now one of the most finished masters of his profession. The character of Alfonso IX. is not an over agreeable one; but M. Faure brings to it a grace and dignity which more than atone for its unsympathetic attributes. No one can look "every inch a king" more thoroughly than this accomplished gentleman, whose popularity, here as elsewhere, increases year by year. His rendering of the melodious "romanza" (why so styled it is difficult to explain), "A tanto amore," when Alfonso bestows the hand of his cast-off mistress upon his most valiant and devoted captain, is simply perfect; and the "encore" evoked the other night was as spontaneous as it was general. The fine bass voice of Signor Bagagiolo told well in the music of the fulminating priest, Baldassare. Mdlle. Irma Sassi, a débutante (here at any rate), must be judged in some part of higher importance than that of Inez. The chorus and orchestra performed their duties as well as possibly could be desired, under the able direction of Signor Vianesi.

The first performance of M. Gounod's picturesque opera

Faust e Margherita (as it is entitled at Covent Garden) may be dismissed in a few words. The part of Margherita taxes more severely the powers of Mdlle. Amalia Fossa than that of Violetta (La Traviata), in which she recently made her first appearance before an English audience. The music is hardly suited to her voice, nor is the character quite within reach of her dramatic acquirements. Her most effective scene was that where Margherita, missal in hand, tries vainly to pray in the Cathedral, baulked in her endeavours by the sepulchral denunciations of (to her) the unseen Mephistopheles. Here she was really earnest and effective. But we have seen so many great representatives of Faust's unfortunate victim that it is difficult to put up with a merely average assumption, such as that of Mdlle. Fossa. The rich and mellow contralto voice of Mdlle. Scalchi was again heard to the utmost advantage in the music assigned to the somewhat insignificant part of Siebel (a pure invention of M.M. Barbier and Carré, the French librettists), and she was encored both in the garden air, "Parlatele d'amor," when gathering flowers for Margherita, and in the interpolated song, "Quando a te lieta" (Act 4). The Faust of Signor Nicolini is now, perhaps, the best on the stage. Signor Nicolini looks, acts, and sings the part in such a manner as for the most part to satisfy the judgment of connoisseurs, however exacting. To specify a single example of his singing—"Salve! dimora casta e pura"—the beautiful address to Margherita's humble domicile—was faultlessly given; and it is but fair to add that the effect was enhanced by the delicate and masterly execution of the ornate and graceful obbligato passages for the violin, assigned to Mr. Carrodus, leader of the orchestra. To criticize the Mephistopheles of M. Faure at this time would be superfluous. Nothing more striking in its way has been witnessed on the operatic boards. It is, in fact, both in a vocal and dramatic sense, a masterpiece. Nor is the Valentine of Signor Cotogni, if not precisely up to the standard of our own Santley's memorable impersonation, to be overlooked. It has really fine points, and the death scene is alike natural and impressive. The admirable trio for Faust, Mephistopheles, and Valentine, when the last named meets his death at the hand of his sister's betrayer, was as effectively sung as on any occasion we can remember. Mdlle. Anese and Signor Tagliafico were, as usual, the Marta and Wagner: better could not be wished in either instance. How Faust e Margherita is generally represented at Covent Garden, and what Mr. Harris, aided by the subtle art of the painter, has done for the animated scene of the Kermess, and for the more solemn business of the Cathedral, all frequenters of the opera know. Signor Vianesi conducted, and the orchestra and chorus, now so familiar with the chef d'œuvre of M. Gounod, did their very best. As of old, the chorus of old men, in the scene of the Kermess, was encored and repeated.

The Favorita was repeated on Saturday, with Mdlle. D'Angeri, instead of Madame Paoli, in the part of Leonora. The new lady was generously encouraged by the audience; but, as Dogberry says, "Comparisons are odorous," let us not, then, attempt them. Enough that Mdlle. Angeri exhibits undeniable promise. The rest of the opera was precisely as on the occasion already recorded.

The first appearance for the season of Mdlle. Albani, the young and charming prima donna from Canada, who created so deep an impression last year when she made her début as Amina, and fully confirmed that impression as the heroine of Lucia di Lammermoor, was naturally looked forward to with unusual interest, and Covent Garden was attended on Tuesday evening by an audience full of expectation. In this instance expectation was by no means disappointed. When, in the now usually adopted costume, she advanced from the wings and stepped before the footlights, she was greeted with such favour as sufficiently proved that her return to the scene of her first successes was a welcome event. This cordial and unanimous reception was rewarded by a most finished and eloquent delivery of the opening cavatina, "Regnava nel silenzio," with its florid sequel, "Quando a me," and again by the parting love-duet with Edgardo, "Sulla tomba oscura," to which the truest and most genuine expression was given; the high notes at the conclusion, the facile command of which is one of Mdlle. Albani's most precious acquisitions, sounding as clear and penetrating as they were legitimately put forth. The curtain fell amid loud applause, followed by a double "recall." The duet with Enrico, "Il pallo funesto," when the selfish and despairing Enrico, through the instrumentality of a forged letter, convinces Lucia about the falsehood of Edgardo, sufficed to prove that Mdlle. Albani has been carefully considering the histrionic side of her art. Both sensibility and earnestness were here exhibited, and Lucia's dismay on rapidly glancing at the contents of the fatal document which leads to her ruin was exhibited with unmistakable truth. The opening portion of this duet was given by Mdlle. Albani with as much sentiment as the more tuneful cabaletta, "Si tradirmi tu potrai," with impassioned expression. She had a worthy partner in Signor Cotogni, one of the best Enricos now on the stage. The contract scene, where the abrupt appearance of Edgardo strikes all who are engaged in it with surprise, and Lucia especially with terrified amazement, afforded further opportunity for the young singer to show what progress she is making as an actress. We need scarcely add that the quintet with chorus, "Chi mi frena," in which the part allotted to Lucia is of the highest significance, roused the accustomed enthusiasm, and was followed by the accustomed "encore." Here Mdlle. Albani sang her very best. The entire finale, of which this quintet is the most striking feature, went off with unusual spirit, and again the chief singers were called before the curtain.

Naturally the great scene of the last act, the scene in which the distraught Lucia, in the presence of a numerous retinue, gives eloquent tongue to her despair, in now the most plaintive and touching, now the most florid and brilliant strains, was the culminating point of Mdlle. Albani's performance; and her delivery of this, from beginning to end, especially of the cabaletta, "Sparge di qualche pianto," left little, if any, room for criticism. After this she was thrice called before the foot-lights, amid applause from all parts of the house. Her voice appears to us to have acquired additional strength—it wanted no additional sweetness; her execution of bravura passages and fioriture has wonderfully advanced, and her expression is just what we remember last year. A more decided success on such an occasion has rarely been attained. The laurels offered Mdlle Albani last year, and looked at with a certain timidity, were now grasped with a firm hand and unhesitatingly placed upon her brow.

The new tenor, Signor Pavani, upon whom devolved the arduous character of Edgardo, is evidently an artist of long experience and more than considerable ability. He is one of the exceptions to the too prevalent vice of trembling on sustained notes, and on that account alone would be acceptable; but it is to be feared that he has come too late to make a position here. His most striking performance was the "Maladetto sia l'istante" of the second act. Signor Edardi sang the small tenor part of Bucklaw, and Signor Raguer was very effective in the air with chorus which Raimondo (Bide-the-Bent) delivers at the commencement of the third act; the fine duet between Edgardo and Enrico, which precedes it, being, as usual, omitted. Signor Vianesi conducted in the orchestra.

The opera on Monday was the Africaine; the Barbiere di Siviglia—with Mdlle. Smeroschi as Rosina, and another new tenor, Signor Montanari, as Almaviva, was given on Thursday; and Lucia—in place of the Sonnambula, originally announced—is advertised for to-night (Saturday).

LEIPSIC.—In order to afford such of the public as are more particularly anxious to know what living composers are doing an opportunity of gratifying their taste, Herr R. Seitz has determined to give a series of what he calls Novelty Concerts. The concerts will not take place at stated intervals, but from time to time, as may seem advisable to Herr Seitz. The first concert came off on the 30th ult., when the programme included: Octet for 4 Violins, 2 Violas, and 2 Violoncellos. by Herr Joachim Raff, Op. 176 (published in March, 1873); two Duets (from Op. 25) for Soprano and Alto, by Franz von Holstein (published November, 1870); "Schottische," by E. Geibel; "Melusine," E. Geibel; Violin Sonata, A. Corelli, arranged for Piano and Violin by William Hepworth, Schwerin (published in March, 1869); three Pianoforte Pieces, Romance, Op. 5, Carl Max Meyer, Brussels (published March, 1873); "Phantasiestücke," from Op. 2, Ernst Deurer, Heidelberg (published in April, 1868); five "Biblical Pictures," from Palmblätter, by K. Gerok, set to music by E. Lassen, Weimar, Op. 49 (published in March, 1873).—Herr Theodor Wachtel has appeared at the Stadttheater in Les Huguenots, Il Trovatore, and—of course—Le Postillon de Longjumeau.

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA.

The season began on Tuesday night, at Drury Lane, with a very effective performance of the (once in a year) never unwelcome Lucrezia Borgia of Donizetti, the principal characters in which were allotted to Mdlle. Tietjens (Lucrezia), Madame Trebelli-Bettini (Maffeo Orsini), Signor Mongini (Gennaro), and Signor Medini (the Duke of Ferrara). What of new can there possibly be to say about an opera so familiar to every amateur? What of new about the well-known artists who shone conspicuously in the cast? How often shall it be told that Mdlle. Tietjens is the legitimate successor of Giulia Grisi, as chief of the "tragedy queens" who, for years past, have trod the lyric boards? Enough that she retains, and is likely to retain, her hold upon the public, as the Norma, Lucrezia, Semiramide, Anna Bolena, and, last, not least, Fidelio (which Grisi was wise never to attempt) par excellence. The great scenes in her Lucrezia are now just as we have known them for years past. The unmasking of Lucrezia by the injured and revengeful nobles; the trio of the poisoned cup, "Guai si te sfugge;" the duet when the agonized mother forces the antidote on the unconscious victim to whom she has been compelled by her husband to administer the poison; and the imploring supplication, "M'odi, m'odi," after revealing to Gennaro that he also is a "Borgia," require no fresh description. It will suffice to add that (excepting the trio, which, through no fault of hers, be it understood, was hardly so well given as we have been used to) they produced their accustomed effect, and roused the accustomed enthusiasm.

Madame Trebelli-Bettini, often and not unjustly styled a legitimate successor to the incomparable Alboni, gave the romance in the prologue, "Nella fatal di Rimini," and the famous brindisi, "Il segreto per esser felice," in her best manner, and, need it be added, was called upon to repeat the latter—which she did, from the second stanza. Signor Mongini's Gennaro is what it has always been since his first assumption of the part in this country. His delivery of the charming melody, "Di pescatore ignobile," differs in a measure from that of other distinguished tenors, in its somewhat over-elaboration; but it was given with earnest feeling and unanimously encored. Signor Mongini's noble voice, with its full and resonant high notes, is in admirable order, and this was emphatically shown by his delivery of the soliloquy, "Deserta in terra," from another opera (Don Sebastian), which he is in the habit of interpolating at the beginning of the second act. In the trio, already named, he did not sing the beautiful melody allotted to Gennaro, while Lucrezia and her husband are in private and angry discourse, in the subdued "mezza voce" to which other great tenors have accustomed us, and it consequently lost something of its effect and missed the seldom failing "encore." Signor Medini (from Naples and Cairo), to whom was, on Tuesday night, entrusted the important character of the Duke, although evidently suffering from cold, will, we think, prove himself an artist of a high stamp. His vocalization appears to us thoroughly pure and genuine, and his acting that of a practised and intelligent comedian; besides which he possesses a voice of rare quality. More will be heard of this gentleman, or we are much mistaken. One of the subordinate parts was assigned to another stranger, Signor Pro (from Rome), who represented that exemplary personage Gubetta with characteristic forbidingness; the others being set down for Signors Rinaldini (Rustighello), Sinigaglia (Liverotto), Zoboli (Gazella), Marchetti (Vitelozzo), Casaboni (Pertrucci), and Campobello (Astolfo). After which no more need be written about Lucrezia Borgia. The reception given by the audience to Mdlle. Tietjens and the other "principals" was in the highest degree cordial—as was that accorded, before the opera began, to Sir Michael Costa, who conducted the performance. The "Generalissimo of all the Orchestras," as he has been appropriately styled, deserves hearty recognition of the manifold services he has rendered in his capacity. Sir Michael Costa has further improved his orchestra (which still enjoys the valuable co-operation of M. Sainton, as chief of the first violins) and also his chorus. Thus the general performance, which he directed with all his well-known zeal and precision, was, so far as he was concerned, everything that could be wished. The National Anthem was performed by chorus and orchestra, at the beginning of the evening.

Mr. Mapleson's future arrangements look well upon paper. Mdme. Christine Nilsson, Mdlles. Ilma di Murska, Clara Louise Kellogg, and Marie Roze are once more in the company, besides some strangers, of whom, knowing nothing, we can say nothing. The department on the other side is, in its way, also strong, including Signors Campanini, Fancelli, &c., among the tenors, in addition to Signor Antonio Aramburo, about whom there has been a good deal of talk. In the baritone and bass departments will be found most of the favourites of last season, including Signors Rota, Mendioroz, Agnesi, Borella, &c. But the subject need not further be dwelt upon. As the unknown artists come and are heard, so they will be judged according to their merits; the old ones will doubtless maintain the repute they have earned.

The only absolute novelty promised is an opera called Il Talismano, founded on Walter Scott's Tales of the Crusaders. This opera was left in manuscript by the late Mr. W. Balfe, not entirely completed, the task, if we are rightly informed, having been kindly undertaken, under certain conditions, by one of Balfe's oldest and most intimate friends, Sir Michael Costa. Mr. Mapleson announces the Favorita of Donizetti, the Mignon of Ambroise Thomas, and Meyerbeer's Dinorah as "novelties;" but this can only be intended in the sense that certain parts are assigned either to new aspirants or to singers who have not hitherto attempted them—as in the instances of Mdlle. Tietjens, who is to play the Leonora of Donizetti, and thus complete her triad of "Leonoras;" and of Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, who, for the first time, undertakes the character of Filina, in the Mignon of M. Thomas. The last paragraph in the prospectus informs us that, in consequence of the satisfaction caused "in musical circles" by the production of Cherubini's Deux Journées, the director will be induced to repeat the opera, should "the other important arrangements permit." Some may be inclined to think that the reproduction of this masterpiece—which, it will be remembered, was played but once last summer—would be the important event of the season.

Lucia di Lammermoor, with Mdlle. Ilma di Murska as the heroine—the part in which she first appeared before a London audience—was given on Thursday. Semiramide—with Mdlle. Tietjens, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, and Signor Agnesi, as the Queen, Arsace, and Assur—will be performed to-night (Saturday).

MUSIC IN BERLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Amongst the most extensively circulated and tamely unchallenged delusions obtaining in English society is the impression that North Germany in general, and Berlin in particular, are the headquarters of modern musical culture. When anyone, known as a votary of the divine art, who has resided for some time in the Prussian capital, is fortunate enough to come to London for a holiday, and makes his appearance at certain old familiar harmonious haunts, straightway his musical acquaintance proceeds to congratulate him upon the good luck that has fallen to his share, in that he has been permitted to worship within the very penetralia of Apollo's temple, and must have been, unless he shamefully neglected his opportunities, au dernier mieux with the gracious Polyhymnia herself. In vain he protests against these felicitations—those who utter them are firmly convinced that Berlin is an earthly paradise of sweet sounds; that its society teems with accomplished dilettanti; that its concerts are monumentally classical; that its operatic performances are as nearly perfect as anything human may hope to be; that every second young lady you meet in a Berlin salon is a happy combination of Arabella Goddard and Theresa Tietjens; and that the Prussian jeunesse dorée—by the way there is no such thing in Prussia, the jeunesse here is not even argentée—is, in the first place, military; then, orchestral and choral—as dexterous in handling the fiddle-bow as in manipulating the needle-gun; familiar with counterpoint as with strategy.

These are some of the articles of faith of a creed which is honestly and resolutely believed in by a vast number of British musicians and music lovers who have never lived in Germany, and who not unreasonably imagine that, because the Fatherland has produced the greatest composers, the German school must be the best, the German ear the most cultivated, the German taste the most pure, the German executants the most accomplished. Were these deductions correct, it would be logical enough to derive from them the further belief that in the capital of Germany all these excellences should be more fully developed than they can be anywhere else. But, from the first to the last, the deductions alluded to are erroneous. The existing German school of teaching, both vocal and instrumental, is conspicuously deficient in the higher scholastic attributes, if it may be fairly judged by the pupils it turns out. At the present moment there are not two prime donne in Germany whose intonation is pure, and whose vocalisation is not clumsy and laboured, nor is there one tenor capable of sustaining a part richly embellished with fioriture like that of Almaviva, of Otello, or of Ottavio, to the satisfaction of a Covent Garden audience. The object of the modern German school, with regard to the voice, appears to be to develop power at the expense of quality; of flexibility and tone-colour it seems to take no account whatsoever. Consequently, all our tenors here roar, and all our soprani squeal—the one class as reckless as the other with regard to the summum bonum of all vocalisation—namely, a steady fidelity to the middle of the note—and they are applauded vehemently by audiences that plume themselves upon the possession of musical culture and critical acumen. This besetting sin of German operatic artists—viz., that they sing out of tune—characterises the concert-room vocalist as well as the amateur performer. A German young lady who sings in tune is really as great a rarity as a Tuscan peasant or artisan whose intonation is incorrect. Fortunately, "tea and a little music" is not so common a form of entertainment here as it is in England, and a foreigner rarely becomes intimate enough, however long he may live in Berlin, with a native family to be subjected to the peine forte et dure of young ladies' vocal performances. But he can get his teeth set on edge at the Royal Opera, or the Academy of Singing, any night of the week during the winter—nay, at the former institution all the year round, save a few weeks during the extreme violence of a northern summer's blazing heat. For the infliction of acute suffering upon a person afflicted with a sensitive musical ear, the Opera House has no rival, to the best of my belief, in Europe. Englishmen, for whose delectation the finest living vocalists are annually gathered together from all parts of the world, can hardly realise the fact that an Art Institute, richly subventioned by the Royal Exchequer, and supported by the public so heartily that financially it has nothing to wish for, is unable to secure the services of a prima donna, a first tenor, a contralto, or a basso profundo, who can sing in tune. Yet such is its melancholy case. Since Pauline Lucca turned her back upon Berlin in disgust, we have had no leading soprano part sung evenly and uniformly in tune until the arrival of Madame Artôt, with a scratch company of Italian artists, seventh-rate vocalists and actors, but infinitely more agreeable to listen to than the indigenous staff of the Hofoper. The performances throughout the winter, played to crowded houses for the most part, have afforded the strangest contrast of admirable mises-en-scène and execrable singing. No impresario acquainted with the London public would have ventured to offer it such entertainments. The chamber music, with the glorious exception of Joachim's quartet series, has been more inoffensive, but insignificant and tiresome. One young pianist, Herr Joseffy, has made a mark, and will probably be heard in London a year or two hence; but the average merit of the performances, vocal and instrumental, has been of an order that could never obtain a hearing in St. James's Hall, Hanover Square Rooms, or the Crystal Palace. At one of Mr. Joseffy's concerts, which I attended, a picked audience of local dilettanti rapturously applauded and recalled a lady for singing a long and elaborate cavatina of Rossini's exactly a quarter of a tone below the key in which it was accompanied by the concert-giver. As a proof of the decadence into which musical taste has fallen in this city, I may mention that the dearth of vocal and instrumental entertainments with any pretension (founded on fact) to excellence is so great that when Mr. Ullmann issues his annual announcement of the three concerts he gives here every winter, there is a competition for the tickets that reminds one of the good old Jenny Lind days. Now, Ullmann's troupe is made up of respectable mediocrities; and his programmes are composed of the most venerable stock pieces that have ever been hacked to death any time these twenty years. People who frequent London concert-rooms shudder when they see "Di piacer," "Ah! perdona," "Der Wand'rer," and "Le Carnaval de Venise," printed in their afternoon's menu. Here the would-be æsthetic and exclusive Berliner, despite their Wagner worship, pay almost any price to listen to those antiquated morceaux. I do not wonder at it, considering the quality of their ordinary musical fare; but I maintain that the English public is in every way better catered for, and that it deserves so to be; not because it can pay higher prices for first-class talent—that is an accident of circumstances—but because it has better taste, more ear, and greater cultivation in the art of music, man for man and woman for woman, than has the German public—always excepting that of Vienna, which is facile princeps in those respects.

Berlin has Joachim, it is true; but so has London. In every other respect, musically speaking, London is as far ahead of Berlin as it is, say, of Aberdeen. I do not mean in the quality of its operatic or orchestral performances only, for those are after all chiefly rendered by foreign artists, but with respect to its native talent. Where may be heard, not only here, but in all Germany, such a ballad-singer as Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mdme. Sainton Dolby, or Miss Edith Wynne? What German tenor ever could be compared to Sims Reeves—and where is the baritone in the Fatherland who can hold a candle to Santley? In the list of the half-dozen finest living pianists there will be found no name of German-born man or woman, save that of Clara Schumann; and her we can at least balance, if not surpass, with Arabella Goddard. Liszt is a Hungarian, Rubinstein a Russian, Delaborde a Frenchman. The first living violinist is a Hungarian. The two best 'cellists are an Italian, Piatti, and a Belgian, De Swert—by the way, the latter has resigned his post at the Prussian Court, and intends visiting London this season. In all the great vocal careers Germany is nowhere—she produces no first-class voices, and no great artists. Why should English people sit down contentedly under the impression that, musically speaking, they are not to be compared with the Germans? You shall hear more good music, and better performed, during a week in London than you shall throughout a whole season in Berlin! And, depend upon it, the majority of English men and women moving in middle-class society is gifted by nature with a more correct ear, and has acquired more refined taste, judgment, and appreciation, of the merits and demerits of musical performances and compositions than is possessed by the corresponding class in Germany. As for the superiority in quality of the average English voice over the average German voice, there cannot be a doubt about it. Both schools of vocalisation are radically bad; but the English is the least vicious. This, too, is very certain, that no music-hall British public would tolerate the singing that nightly elicits the applause of the Berlin Royal Opera audience. Dixi, et liberavi animam!—Daily Telegraph.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—As a great admirer of German musical ability, of which a four years' residence in that country has afforded me ample opportunities of judging, I cannot withhold my opinion of the article which appeared in the Daily Telegraph of Wednesday, April 9th. The Berlin correspondent of that paper seems to be very partial in his statements, which in an Englishman might be excusable, but in a musician and (or?) a musical critic is anything but fair.

It is but rarely that we hear it said that Germany stands second to any nation with respect to its instrumentalists, but the correspondent aforesaid in order to convince us that such is the case, writes:—

"In the list of the half-dozen finest living pianists there will be found no name of German-born man or woman, save that of Clara Schumann, and her we can at least balance, if not surpass, with Arabella Goddard. Liszt is a Hungarian, Rubinstein a Russian, Delaborde a Frenchman. The finest living violinist is a Hungarian. The two best 'cellists are an Italian, Piatti, and a Belgian, De Swert."

Is the writer of the above unaware of the existence of a pianist of the name of Hans von Bülow, of a 'cellist, Grützmacher, and of a violinist, Singer, of whom, by the way, it has been said, that could he exchange his right hand for that of Joachim, the ideal of a violinist would be realized.

In the same article certain English vocalists are held up as a pattern to our Teutonic brethren, who are nevertheless content to be enthralled by the singing of a Mallinger and of a Wachtel.

The writer very sensibly refrains from drawing comparisons between the composers of different nationalities because he is but too well aware that an enquiry into the subject might remove a little of the gilt from the article of which English readers are to derive the full benefit; but in place of this he attacks the German school of teaching—vocal and instrumental—which, according to him, "is conspicuously deficient in the higher scholastic attributes, if it may be fairly judged by the pupils it turns out." If "our own correspondent" were to devote a short time to running over the names of the principal English composers and instrumentalists he would discover—no doubt much to his chagrin—that they, for the most part, have been educated in Germany, or, at least, by Germans. He would also not be less surprised to find that the whole of England could not produce an orchestra like, for instance, that of the "Gewandhaus" in Leipzig, in which the musical spirit of Mendelssohn, who so long directed it, has not entirely died out.

Taking the article headed "Music in Berlin" as a whole, it would seem little else than a puff for England at the expense of other nations. We have seen a similar display of spleen in a small commercial war, in which one of the persons interested writes up—"No connection whatever with my envious neighbour next door."

Much more might be said respecting the musical merits of the respective nations, but I fear that if I do not at once forward these hurriedly-written lines they will reach you too late for insertion in your next Saturday's number; so I will at once subscribe myself, yours respectfully,

WALTER E. LAWSON.

56, Geneva Road, Brixton, S.W., April 9th, 1873.

[The letter of the Daily Telegraph's correspondent is reproduced elsewhere. We have nothing to say to Mr. Lawson, unless it be that if Herr Wachtel is a singer, then we do not greatly care about hearing any more singing.—A.S.S.]

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

The Easter attraction at the huge building in Kensington Gore was a concert, given by that rising young composer, Mr. F. H. Cowen, who, upon his merits, as a representative of our modern school of musicians, in which he shares the honours with Mr. J. F. Barnett and Mr. Arthur Sullivan, is undoubtedly the right person so to come before the public. Mr. Cowen's concert was the more remarkable and attractive from the fact of his Rose Maiden being revived; another feature being the performance of a movement from his No. 1 Symphony. Had Mr. Cowen no stronger claim upon artistic tastes than these compositions it would be strong enough to justify no little enthusiasm. But the young composer showed in his second symphony, lately produced at the Crystal Palace, a vast improvement over his earlier style both in largeness of idea and elaboration of detail. The Rose Maiden is smooth and tuneful. In the orchestration considerable skill is displayed, and the instruments are used with felicity, while the solos and choruses are written with due regard to the voice. Mr. Cowen was fortunate with his vocalists, Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington singing the soprano, Mdme. Patey undertaking the contralto, Mr. Maybrick the baritone, and Mr. Edward Lloyd the tenor parts. Mdme. Sherrington's fine voice tells admirably in the vast area of the Hall, and not a gradation of light or shade is lost. She gained great applause by her rendering of the melodious air, "Bloom on, my roses," and for her share in the duet, "I know a rosebud shining," each of which was given in faultless manner. Madame Patey created a marked effect in the air, "Yet chime they so sadly," which was unanimously encored, and Mr. Edward Lloyd pleased universally in the scena, "Far from the summer's blossom." The cantata was conducted by the composer, and with the aid of an efficient, although not large, band went very well indeed. The other great attraction of the evening—passing over the beautiful and masterly allegretto from Mr. Cowen's No. 1 Symphony—was the finale to Mendelssohn's unfinished opera, Lorely, in which Madame Sherrington took the solo. To describe the beauties of this fragment would require much more space than we can give, so many are the points of interest. The manner in which the climax is reached, when, the Rhine spirits having been summoned, the vengeful Lorely does justice upon her betrayer, displays the extraordinary genius of Mendelssohn in a manner more pronounced, perhaps, than in any other of his works. This magnificent music was very finely rendered, the chorus being at home in their parts, and Madame Sherrington singing the solos as probably few other artists could. It is scarcely necessary to enter into the details of the rest of the concert, which comprised various well-known ballads, sung with effect by Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Maybrick, Mdlle. Carola, Miss Isabel Weale, and Madame Patey.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

Easter holiday pleasure-seekers, musically inclined, could scarcely have desired a more acceptable entertainment than that provided for them on Monday by Mr. John Boosey, at Exeter Hall. The London Ballad Concerts have achieved a wide popularity, and may now, after a probation of seven years, be regarded as a fixed and permanent institution. The fact is not at all surprising; on the contrary, there would be reason for wonder if it were otherwise. The original idea, suggested by a belief that a very large ballad-loving public existed in the metropolis and its environs, was thoroughly well-founded; and the form of the programmes, which comprised a mixture in fair proportions of old songs and new songs, was excellent. The old songs, in experienced hands, were certain to please; while the new songs were adjudged according to their merit; and it must be admitted that the Ballad Concerts have been the means of bringing forward a number of good things, from the pens of living composers entitled to consideration, which otherwise might never have been written—or, at any rate, never have enjoyed the opportunity of a public estimate of their value. In adhering to the plan which he first adopted, and departing from it in no essential particular, Mr. Boosey has done wisely. All who care about the style of music he advocates are aware that a "ballad concert" announced by him is a "ballad concert" in the strictly legitimate acceptation of the phrase. How much variety may be secured by a carefully selected programme, after the model hinted at, need not be told. Of course, to make the thing attractive at all points, the singers must be of the best; and this has been kept in mind by the director, who has always endeavoured to enlist the services of the most experienced artists. An occasional sprinkling of instrumental music—in the shape of solos for pianoforte or violin, &c.—takes nothing away from the professed object of the concerts, the selections being invariably contrived to fit more or less the special character of the entertainment. To conclude, however; as there are people who like oratorios and operas, and people who like symphonies, quartets, sonatas, &c., so there are people who like genuine songs and ballads, old and new. For these last Mr. John Boosey has known how to provide, just as Mr. Arthur Chappell knew how to provide for quite a different class of amateurs, and thus to establish his now famous Monday Popular Concerts.

There were two Ballad Concerts on Tuesday, one in the afternoon and one in the evening, each a pattern in its way. A few words about the evening concert are all that is requisite. The singers were Misses Jenny Pratt, Enriquez, and Banks, Messrs. George Perren, Guy, and Santley, who gave a well-varied and interesting series of songs and ballads so much to the satisfaction of the audience that "encores" were the rule rather than the exception. To take all these demonstrations into account would exceed our limits. We must, therefore, be satisfied to instance those in the first part of the programme. Mr. Santley, in splendid voice, giving the "Stirrup cup" of Signor Arditi with even more than his ordinary spirit, was compelled by unanimous desire to repeat it, and, being no less favoured in a vigorous new maritime ditty by Mr. J. L. Hatton, "The British Tar," to some thoroughly characteristic words by Mr. J. V. Bridgeman, returned to the platform and indulged the audience with the popular setting by "Henriette" of Charles Mackay's ballad, "The King and I." Miss Jenny Pratt, being called back after Mr. Henry Smart's perennial "Lady of the Lea," substituted Sir Julius Benedict's always welcome ballad, "By the sad sea waves." Mr. Guy, the promising young tenor from our Royal Academy of Music, was twice recalled after Ascher's melodious romance, "Alice, where art thou?"; and Miss Enriquez was greatly applauded in Mr. Taylor's setting of Mr. C. L. Kenney's poetical stanzas, "Turn where I may my tearful eyes." Dussek's canzonet, "Name the glad day," was sung by Miss Banks—who was first to resuscitate it at the Monday Popular Concerts; Mr. George Perren, encored in Nelson's "Mary of Argyle," substituted Balfe's "Come into the garden, Maud;" and Miss Enriquez was obliged to repeat Madame Sainton Dolby's charming ballad, "When we are old and grey." Bishop's "Tell me my heart" (Miss Banks), and Balfe's "When other lips and other hearts" (Mr. George Perren), brought Part I. to a successful conclusion. In Part II. there was quite as much enthusiasm about the vocal music, but further details are not called for. To the foregoing must be added, however, the overture to Guillaume Tell (encored), and other pieces performed upon harmoniums by the Le Jeune family, who have adopted for their exhibitions the nomenclature of "Orchestral Combination;" and two brilliant fantasias —"Air Irlandais" and "Le jet d'eau"—the compositions of Mr. Sydney Smith, whose name as an author of drawing-room music of the most agreeable kind has fairly been pronounced "a household word," and who plays just as agreeably as he composes. The "Air Irlandais" being encored, Mr. Sydney Smith played another of his favourite pieces. Herr Meyer Lutz accompanied all the vocal music on the pianoforte in a manner that left nothing to desire. At the morning concert, where, besides the singers already named, Mdme. Patey and Mr. Edward Lloyd appeared, the post of accompanist was held with no less ability by Mr. W. Ganz.

BACH'S MATTHEW PASSION AT ST. PAUL'S.

Few could have believed, some years ago, that the Matthew Passion of John Sebastian Bach would ever attain the popularity—or, in other words, the hold on public sympathy—which, after a neglect so long and undeserved, it has now reached. Even Mendelssohn, the first to resuscitate it from the oblivion in which it had remained for a century, or Sir Sterndale Bennett, founder of the Bach Society, and earliest in this country to insist resolutely upon its transcendent claims to admiration, would scarcely have believed that a time was not far off when as many as five performances of the very greatest work of its kind ever produced would be heard, in less than as many days, by vast crowds of appreciative listeners. And yet we have only just recently borne witness to the fact. At Albert Hall, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Barnby, who took the initiative two years since, in Westminster Abbey, and at his own excellent concerts, the Matthew Passion was performed on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday in Holy Week; while on the Tuesday it was the principal feature of a solemn act of worship within the walls of our great Metropolitan cathedral. To Mr. Barnby's continued efforts in this direction we must take another opportunity of referring. Our present duty is to say a few words about the special service at St. Paul's, than which anything more impressive could not well be imagined. Long before the service began crowds came in through the western door, the holders of favoured tickets for places under the dome being admitted by the south. At seven o'clock the church was thronged in every part, the number present being computed at upwards of 10,000. And yet a congregation more religiously attentive perhaps never assembled in a church. A large majority were in all likelihood attracted by Bach's sublime music; but the service preceding it—a special service for the occasion—was followed as scrupulously as though there had been no unusual thing to come after. It could scarcely have been ushered in more appropriately than with the voluntary played by Mr. George Cooper, organist of St. Sepulchre's, Chapel Royal, &c., who began with J. S. Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E minor (one of Mendelssohn's particular favourites), a slow movement in A minor from Onslow, and "He was despised," from Handel's Messiah. While these beautiful pieces went on the congregation were quietly taking their seats. Then the "Miserere mei Deus" ("Have mercy upon me, O God,") began with due solemnity, the sentences of the priest being intoned by the Rev. Sparrow Simpson, a minor canon of the Cathedral. The music of this was the ancient "Tonus Regalis," adapted by Dr. Stainer, with the addition of an effective "Gloria" of his own composition. The remaining part of the form of service, including the Confession and Lord's Prayer, was "Old English."

This portion of the ceremony was succeeded by the music of the Passion, for the efficient rendering of which Dr. Stainer, Sir John Goss's successor as organist of St. Paul's, had made all the necessary preparations. There was a surpliced choir of not far from 300 singers, a thoroughly efficient orchestra of stringed and wind instruments, nearly 50 in number, also in surplices, besides an additional unsurpliced vocal contingent in the transepts, numbering upwards of 400, for the purpose of aiding and encouraging the congregation to take part in the chorals. The principal singers were Mr. Kerr Gedge, who recited the narrative, &c., of the Evangelist admirably, and Mr. Winn, principal bass, to whom were allotted the words of the Redeemer; two other basses, Messrs. De Lacey and Horscroft, divided the less important music set down for Pilate, Peter, and Judas. The soprano and alto solos were entrusted to boys. The recitatives were accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Walker, instructor of the boys at St. Paul's. Dr. Stainer conducted, and the organ part was played throughout by Mr. G. Cooper. There being no sermon, and the preliminary service being comparatively short, much more of the Passion music was introduced than would otherwise have been practicable. For the greater part, the selections were given in a highly praiseworthy manner. In the magnificent opening chorus, "Come, ye daughters, weep with me," the chorale, "O Thou begotten Son of God," which sounds so clear and bright above the vocal and instrumental elaborations of the score, was intrusted to some 70 boys, trained by Mr. George Bennett, B.A., of Christ's Hospital. The effect was admirable. All the choruses, with one exception—"Have lightnings and thunders in clouds disappeared," by some accident started off too impetuously—were delivered with remarkable precision; and it is no little to say that the first (already named) and the last, "In tears of grief we here recline," one of the loveliest and most pathetic examples of choral writing in existence, were best of all. The shout on the word "Barabbas," when the multitude, in answer to Pilate's question, elect that the criminal, instead of Jesus, shall be released, was strikingly impressive. The chorales, almost without exception, were well sung, and in several of them a large number of the congregation joined with more or less goodwill; let us point especially to "O Lord, Thy love's unbounded," "O Father, let Thy will be done," and "O Lord, who dares to smite Thee?" But, under the circumstances, further criticism would be out of place. We need only repeat what we have already said—that the Passion music of Bach, as an integral part of the act of solemn worship, is incomparable. For that intent it was composed, and, thus presented, it can never fail to edify, whether the congregation join audibly in the Lutheran chorales, or merely listen to them, inwardly moved by their simple eloquence.

After the Passion music came the collect, "Almighty God, we beseech Thee to behold this Thy family;" and then the Blessing was pronounced from the altar by the Bishop of London. The organ voluntary played by Mr. Cooper as the congregation dispersed included a very interesting and not generally known Prelude with Fugue in A minor, by Bach,* followed by Handel's chorus, "All we like sheep have gone astray." The greatest credit, it is only fair to add, is due to Dr. Stainer for the care and skill which he must have devoted to the preparation of this most interesting special service.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

The three Trio Soirées got up by Mdme. Auguste Auspitz-Köler, assisted by Herr Joseph Hellmesberger, and Professor Heinrich Röver, of the Conservatory, took place on the 13th, 20th, and 27th ult., in the Bösendorfer Rooms. The programme included:—I. Trio in B flat, Op. 4, Karl Goldmark; Sonata in C minor, for pianoforte and violin, Phil. Em. Bach; Sonata in A flat, Op. 110, L. van Beethoven; Trio in G minor, Op. 110, Robert Schumann. II. Quartet in E flat major, W. A. Mozart; Sonata in A minor, Op. 23, L. van Beethoven; Sonata in F minor, Op. 14, Robert Schumann; Trio in E flat major, Op. 35, G. P. Grüdener. III.—Sonata in D minor, Op. 121, for pianoforte and violin, Robert Schumann; Nocturne in E flat major, Op. 148, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, Franz Schubert; Double Sonata, Corelli; Trio in E flat major, Op. 40, for pianoforte, violin, and horn, Johannes Brahms.

Joseph Haydn's oratorio, Stabat Mater, was performed on Good Friday, for the first time in a church of this capital, by the Altlerchenfeld Union for Sacred Music. The principal vocal solos were taken by Mdme. Friedrich Materna, of the Imperial Operahouse, Mdlle. Antonia Wolf, of the Gesang-Verein, Herr Pirk, and Dr. Emil Kraus.

Mdlle. Rabatinsky, late of the Imperial Opera, was married on the 25th ult., to Herr Joseph Zacharias, a rich manufacturer of Berlin.

The Brothers Johann and Eduard Strauss, celebrated on the 6th inst., in the rooms of the Musical Union, the fiftieth year of the existence of the Strauss Concerts. It was exactly fifty years ago, on the 9th, that Herr Strauss, sen., opened with his first orchestra, consisting of 18 performers. He gradually increased it to 30, and, with it thus augmented, paid several professional visits to Paris, London, Brussels, and all the great cities of Germany. At his death, in September, 1849, his eldest son, Johann, assumed the direction, and subsequently increased the number of performers to 42. He, also, undertook professional tours all over Europe. In 1853, the direction was assumed by Joseph Strauss, and from 1862 it was shared between Joseph and Eduard. Joseph died in 1870, and Eduard is now sole director, the orchestra numbering 47 musicians. Of these, the oldest is the first flautist, Herr Jacob Trauer, who has held his post 35 years. A great number of his colleagues have been members of the orchestra for periods varying from 15 to 20 years.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

Boulogne-sur-Mer, April 9th.

On Thursday last La Muette de Portici (otherwise Masaniello) attracted a good, average audience to the theatre. On Thursdays, I don't know why, but the orchestra is never so good as on the other three nights of performance during each week that the troupe of Clement has been here! The well-known overture, however, was performed with more spirit and precision than any other part of the opera. Madame Depoitiers, and M. Bresson (as Masaniello), sang their best, and were ably supported by Madame Kinnel and MM. Fronty, Bourard, Kinnel, Gerard, and Faro. The part of Fenella was "impersonated" by Mdlle. Osmond, our première danseuse, whose expression and gesticulation were admirable. I wonder if it was by accident or on purpose that she wore a dress on the skirt of which were three flounces—one black, the next yellow, and the third red—forming the Belgian colours, and recalling to one's mind the historical fact that Masaniello was the opera performed at Brussels on the night of August 25th, 1830, at which all the "Reds" had given rendezvous, and after which the Revolution immediately commenced.

Le prémier jour de bonheur, Auber's last opera, produced in Paris in February 1868, was given on Saturday. It is pretty, and the plot, though not very intricate, is interesting, particularly so to some of our concitoyens; while a grotesquely represented English Milord (by name Sir John Littlepol Green Becker Brown, of 24, Pitt Street, Tottenham Court Road,) is on the stage. The whole is founded on an incident during the war between England and France in 1746, when Dupleix, the French Governor of Pondicherry, marched upon Madras, and compelled that town to capitulate. The story is simply this: A young English lady and her cousin have wandered out of Madras and suddenly find themselves in the enemy's camp. An armistice which they think exists has expired a few hours, and they are made prisoners. The officer in charge of the outpost has seen the lady in England and admires her, and, at her solicitation, sets her free, her plea to him being that there is a ball in Madras next night; the cousin is, however, secured. Of course, the French officer follows the "liberated dove," and gets taken prisoner. The ball takes place, at which he plays high and wins; but news comes from the governor that the English cousin is about to be shot for a spy, and that a French prisoner must do so also. Helène, the heroine, hearing of this ceases, as she has hitherto done, to hate Gaston, the hero, and begins to pity him. Well "pity is akin to love," and Sir John, the cousin, who is not shot, returns, and all ends happily.

This opera has been played before by this company, while at Rennes, so all the artists were well up in their parts; Mdme. Depoitiers, as the heroine, looking and singing as piquantly as possible, especially in two songs I would mention, "Les officiers français, dit on, sont maitres en galanterie," and "La chanson de Suzanne et du beau caporal." Mdlle. Faigle I have never heard sing so well; "Ah! voici la nuit" she gave with more ease and tone in her voice, than I thought she possessed. M. Bresson, who has a good voice if he always knew how to utilize it, took the part of the hero. His singing was not so good as in La Muette. Sir John (the Englishman) was a piece of bouffe acting just suited to M. Herrewyn. Messrs. Kinnel and Gerald sang with taste the minor parts of two French officers. The choruses went well, the mise-en-scène good, and last, not least, the orchestra, very good, especially as I know there were only four in the band of thirty-two who had seen the score two days before. The introduction to the second act, for the violins, was especially good, and M. Champenon is really to be congratulated on his generally very efficient band, which he always conducts with precision and spirit. The repetition of Hamlet on Sunday to a rather small audience finished one week, and the constant ringing of church bells, to summon the faithful to the innumerable masses prescribed for this week, "are all the sounds" we hear.

Boulogne-sur-Mer, April 16th.

The Stabat Mater at the church of Saint Nicholas on Thursday; a mass of Cherubini's on Sunday last at the same church, and Haydn's "Imperial" mass at the Cathedral on Sunday, constituted our "observance" of Holy Week. The latter was splendidly rendered by a picked band, under the direction of M. Picard, a chorus, partly of amateurs, and soloists, among the latter of whom one could not fail to recognise and admire the voice of M. Fronty, our barytone at the theatre. After the mass this gentleman sang, with earnestness and taste, a composition of his own to the words "Laudate Dominum;" I believe it was called a "Salut."

On Sunday evening, at the theatre, Auber's Haydée ou le Secret was played. Monday, being "Lundi de Paques," was an extra night, and Geneviève de Brabant delighted a large French, and small English, audience.

Le prémier jour de bonheur was repeated on Tuesday to a not over large audience. Three of the principal characters in this opera are supposed to be English. Why only one of them should act the buffoon in the shape of bad grammar and over-exaggerated pronunciation is to me a mystery. In fact, M. Herrewyn (who, by the way, is very particular about the spelling of his name, and wrote to the local papers last week that one of the eight letters composing it had been left out, or something of the sort) "gagged," and when there was a chance of a verb "present" he made it "imperfect;" for instance, are English supposed to be so badly "up" in French as always to say "oh oui je voulais" for "oh oui je veux," or "j'allais" for "Je vais." I followed in the "book of the opera," so know that M. Herrewyn did not, many times, follow the words written to Auber's music by Messrs. Dennery and Cormon.

The wind last week was in the east. On Sunday it was Easter. It has turned finer since, or I might have to report, in a superlative Anglo-French expression, it is east-est. S. C.

ILMA DI MURSKA AT MANCHESTER.

The Manchester papers, without exception, have been in extasies with Mdlle. Ilma di Murska's performance of Dinorah in Meyerbeer's celebrated opera. One speaks as follows:—

"The end of our short opera season was signalised by a performance of Meyerbeer's Dinorah, for the benefit of the lady whose name, perhaps, more than any other, is associated with the representation of the woes and wayward humours of the distracted village maiden. How prettily the character is conceived by Mdlle. Ilma di Murska we need not say to any one who has seen how gracefully she interprets everything she undertakes. The music might have been written expressly for her voice and style. Certainly in nothing are her special qualities more valuable than as the heroine of Dinorah. Not only is there the world-famed 'Shadow Song'—which, by-the-bye, is never heard as it ought to be except on the stage—but almost every morceau for soprano in the opera makes as great demands upon the capacity of the vocalist for the execution of florid passages of every conceivable form. These were given in Mdlle. di Murska's best manner, and over and over again she drew down the enthusiastic plaudits of her audience."

A writer in another widely-circulated journal has the subjoined:—

"In concluding our notices of these operatic performances we would again reiterate our felicitations on their success in all senses, for nothing has been wanting on the part of the management, both on the stage and in the auditorium, to conduce to the enjoyment of the audiences, and foremost among those who deserve praise must be placed Signor Li Calsi, who has had the musical direction throughout the season. He has kept the band well together in a most unobtrusive manner, and to him is due, in no small measure, the very perfect performances that it has been our agreeable duty to listen to and report on. We shall anticipate with increased interest and pleasure the future visits of Mr. Mapleson's company, since there is such a disposition on all sides to give as perfect representations as is possible in a provincial theatre."

Another paper of no less wide-spread authority thus expresses its opinion:—

"The deeply-interesting performance of Mdlle. Ilma di Murska as the heroine is well known to Manchester amateurs. In this opera she made her first appearance here, and the enthusiastic manner in which she was received last night warrants us in saying that her acting and singing were never more heartily appreciated. Every phase of the poor girl's phantasy was vividly realised, and so thoroughly did Mdlle. di Murska identify herself with the unfortunate Dinorah, that some of her hearers would experience something like a shock when she came to the front, as she was frequently compelled to do, to acknowledge the frantic cheering. The contrast between the frenzied demeanour of Dinorah and the grateful amiability of Mdlle. di Murska was certainly rather startling."

A fourth critic expresses himself in the following terms:—

"Meyerbeer's romantic opera was given last evening for the benefit of Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, and it would be difficult indeed to find an opera better adapted for showing off both the dramatic and vocal qualities of the fair Hungarian prima donna. Her conception of the character of the half-crazy peasant girl seems even more perfect than on the occasion of her previous performance here in Dinorah a few years since, while her singing of the very difficult music was so fine that we feel quite inadequate to do Mdlle. di Murska justice. This visit of the opera company will be memorable for two performances if for nothing else—Gilda and Dinorah. In both Mdlle. di Murska proved herself to be as great an actress as she was known to be a vocalist, and we feel sure that on future occasions her impersonations of these characters will attract all lovers of the lyric drama."

The impression made upon the Manchester operatic public by Mdlle. di Murska's wonderful execution of the two exceptional airs allotted to the "Queen of Night" in the Flauto Magico need not be described. London amateurs know well enough that since Anna Zerr no singer has been able to master them so thoroughly.

Reval.—Glinka's celebrated opera, Life for the Czar, was given here for the first time at the benefit of Herr Schmidt, the conductor, and pleased immensely. Herr Heck, in the principal part, made a great hit, and was called on fourteen times, a thing never known before in these latitudes.

Naples.—After the fourth representation of Aida, Verdi was escorted to his hotel by 20,000 persons, amid extraordinary enthusiasm. Two orchestras, stationed in front of the hotel, afterwards played a selection from his works. Verdi appeared on the balcony, and was loudly acclaimed. "It was not enthusiasm," says one reporter, "it was delirium."

ST. JAMES'S HALL,

REGENT STREET AND PICCADILLY.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ'S

Pianoforte Recitals.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ has the honour to announce that his Thirteenth Series of PIANOFORTE RECITALS will take place on the following Afternoons:—

|---|---|
| FRIDAY, May 2, | FRIDAY, May 30, |
| FRIDAY, May 9, | FRIDAY, June 6, |
| FRIDAY, May 16, | FRIDAY, June 13, |
| FRIDAY, May 23, | FRIDAY, June 20. |

The forthcoming series of "Recitals" will again in a measure differ from the majority of its predecessors. The programmes will be more varied, and Mr. HALLÉ ventures to think—the eager desire for novelty, a marked distinction of the present day, taken into consideration—more agreeably varied, and generally instructive. At each "Recital" it is intended to include compositions—duets, trios, &c.—in which the pianoforte is accompanied by other instruments. One of the concerted pieces will invariably be selected from works belonging to the "modern German school"—from Robert Schumann to Johannes Brahms, Raff, &c.—now a topic of discussion in all musical circles, whether amateur or professional. Each of these composers, together with others unnecessary to designate by name, will be illustrated by some representative piece, in which the style and peculiar way of thinking of the author may be exemplified to the best advantage. The experiment was tried by Mr. HALLÉ at his Twelfth Series (1872), and met with such warm encouragement as to embolden him to repeat it.

In other respects the scheme of the "Pianoforte Recitals" will be entirely in consonance with the spirit of those which the aristocracy and the general musical public have for so many years liberally supported. The programme of each "Recital," as a matter of course, will include a grand sonata for pianoforte alone, by Beethoven, or some other universally recognised master. Perhaps no more acceptable way of making the value of these great works evident could be designed than that of providing an opportunity of comparing them with what has been written since they were produced. To shut out what is doing at the time in which we actually live would not only be unfair, but injudicious; and Mr. HALLÉ believes that by a further introduction of several among the most remarkable examples of "the modern school," the interest of his hearers will, as before, be very considerably enhanced.

The other solo pianoforte pieces to be performed by Mr. HALLÉ will be selected from works of acknowledged masters—from J. S. Bach and Handel to Dussek, Weber, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Chopin, and their most renowned contemporaries. It is hoped that this variety may sustain the repute of the programmes, as it must surely enrich them, by opening up new sources of interest for the consideration of earnest amateurs, who desire to perfect their knowledge and experience, by making themselves acquainted with all styles of pianoforte music which, after their manner, legitimately uphold the dignity and purity of art.

The programmes, as on previous occasions, are to consist of as many pieces as may limit the duration of the performance to two hours—from Three o'clock to Five, P.M.

For the concerted pieces Mr. HALLÉ has secured the valuable co-operation of Mdme. NORMAN-NERUDA (Violin), Signor PEZZE and Herr DAUBERT (Violoncellos), &c.

At each "Recital" there will be two vocal pieces.

Descriptions, analytical and historical, of the various compositions will, as usual, accompany the programmes.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1873.

AT last orchestral music is looking up. A very short time ago pessimists and grumblers found in its condition a fertile theme, and many who were neither pessimists nor grumblers, but simply well-wishers to the advance of art, joined in their lamentations. What was the condition referred to? The answer might be made a long one, but it will suffice to state that only during the "season" could an orchestral work be heard without travelling as far as the Crystal Palace and sitting at the feet of Mr. Manns. True, the Crystal Palace is easily reached, and the performances there are so good that a few of them go a great way. But this could not remove from London proper a great shame and disgrace, nor relieve London amateurs of music from the necessity of blushing in presence of the "intelligent and questioning foreigner." A change, however, was bound to come sooner or later. When Mr. Arthur Chappell showed, through the Monday Popular Concerts, that a public for great classical works could be created by dint of perseverance, and when Mr. Manns proved that such works are not limited to "chamber" music, the advent of popular orchestral concerts became a question of merely a very short time. That advent is now, we hope and believe, a matter of current record, the best proof of which may be found at the Royal Albert Hall any day between this and the end of October next. We refer, of course, to the series of orchestral concerts conducted by Mr. Barnby, and associated with the International Exhibition. The performances in question have several unique features, to which reference was made by us a few weeks ago; our present purpose, however, is only insistence upon their value and their meaning. As respects the greatness of their value too much can hardly be said, judging by the doings of this the opening week. Mr. Barnby's orchestra, if not a "machine" able to satisfy the demands of a Hector Berlioz, is large enough for effect in a building so resonant as that at Kensington Gore; and its quality already leaves so little to desire—that complete efficiency may be expected very soon. With good means, the promoters are working up to the best of ends. Their programmes, thus far, show no trimming to catch popular applause, but, rather, a determined holding up of the best models of art. Here, for example, is a group of compositions which have had one or more hearings since the Exhibition opened:—Beethoven's Symphony, No. 8, Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony, Haydn's Surprise, Handel's first Concerto for organ and orchestra, Auber's Exhibition overture, the overtures to Guillaume Tell, Die Zauberflöte, and Le Medecin malgré lui, a ballet air from Schubert's Rosamunda, and the March from Gounod's Reine de Saba. These works speak for themselves, and we need not take the trouble to show what an admirable thing it is to have such music, well played, made a matter of daily enjoyment to every one with a shilling to spare. Let us here render honour where honour is due, and acknowledge the heavy obligation under which the cause of music is placed by the enterprise of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., who have taken the concerts in hand—an obligation not less heavy by the fact that the works performed are not those which readily lend themselves to the abstract purposes of speculation. We hold that an entrepreneur, who is also a music-seller, does a perfectly legitimate thing when he makes one vocation serve the purpose of the other. But when, as an entrepreneur, he does a spirited thing for art, without reference to other interests, he may fairly claim the highest honours of his class. In such a position stand Messrs. Novello with regard to the Exhibition Concerts, just as, for many years past, Messrs. Chappell have stood with regard to the Monday Popular Concerts. They cannot expect the public to rush, money in hand, for symphonies and overtures, and they have incurred heavy responsibilities in sheer reliance upon a general appreciation of high-class musical enterprise. We trust their reward will be great; but in any case they are doing all that can be done to make orchestral concerts thoroughly popular, and to remove a blot upon the musical reputation of this metropolis.

Digitized by Google

We may add to the foregoing that the promises of the prospectus are being carried out as regards young artists. Several vocalists have already been heard, and we understand that arrangements have been made for the speedy appearance of some instrumentalists not yet known to fame. All this promises well.

THE VAN PRAAG TESTIMONIAL.

We have been requested to insert the following "card":—

"Mr. Van Praag begs to inform the subscribers to his Testimonial that his departure for California is fixed for the 26th inst. He therefore requests them to forward their subscriptions to Messrs. W. D. Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, as early as convenient. Mr. Van Praag cannot refrain from expressing his deep gratitude to those ladies and gentlemen who so liberally subscribed to aid him in his project—especially Dr. Marks, who interested many old friends in his case, and Messrs. J. W. and W. D. Davison, the latter of whom promoted the Testimonial. With many kind wishes to all the ladies and gentlemen subscribers, Mr. Van Praag has the honour to subscribe himself their grateful servant.

NATIONAL MUSIC MEETINGS.—We understand that the lists are now finally closed, and that no more competitors than those who have already entered will be allowed to compete in July next. The number of entries is large, and the contest in each class is expected to be unusually keen and exciting.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.—The Fifth Subscription Concert of this Society is announced to take place on Wednesday next, the 23rd inst., when Mendelssohn's Elijah will be performed, the solo vocalists being Madame Otto-Alvsleben, Madame Patey, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Foli. Dr. Stainer will preside at the organ, and the band and chorus, numbering 1200, will be conducted by Mr. Barnby.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Bach's celebrated St. Matthew Passion will be performed, for the first time by the Society, under the direction of Sir Michael Costa, on Friday next, the 25th inst. Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Patey, Mr. C. Henry, and Mr. Santley are entrusted with the principal vocal parts; and an interesting feature in the performance will be the obbligato accompaniment to the song, "Come, blessed cross," played on the viol da gamba (the instrument for which Bach designed it), instead of (as ordinarily), on the violoncello. The viol da gamba has probably not been played in public in this country since the death of C. F. Abel—nearly ninety years ago. In consequence of the length of the oratorio (which is to be given in its entirety) the performance will commence at half-past seven.

HERR JOSEPH JOACHIM, after a stay among us which, though brief, was a series of triumphs, has left England for Germany.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

SIGNOR VERDI, "inspired by the sun of Naples," has composed a string quartet, which was performed for the first time at his own residence, after the representation of Aida. Il Piccolo says that "it is not inferior to the finest creations of Beethoven. . . It is a superb work, in which melody and science, with astonishing art, attain the most ravishing effects." If all this be true, and we unfeignedly hope so, Mr. Arthur Chappell will know how to add Verdi's name to his repertory.

LÉON GATAYES, the musical critic, and friend of Alphonse Karr, was once challenged by a Pianist whom he had censured in one of his notices. At the appointed hour, the persons concerned all met upon the ground. But the Pianist's seconds, for reasons best known to themselves, did not appear so bloodthirsty as on the day before. They began discussing the matter with the seconds on the other side, giving them to understand that, if Léon Gatayes were to demand an apology, it would not be refused. The critic saw at a glance the position of affairs; the consequence was that he declared himself willing to accept the apologies of his adversary, adding, however, that he should not consider them valid unless written, and on stamped paper. Scarcely had he made known his determination, ere the Pianist's seconds rushed off to a neighbouring village for pens, ink, and stamped paper. The Pianist drew up, then and there, the required apologies. "I never had but this one duel," Gatayes used to say, "and nobody can tell how delighted I felt at the turn it took."

A LADY'S EASY CHAIR.

(From "Another World.")

As an instance of luxury in simple things, I will mention a peculiar soft reclining cushion, or settee, particularly adapted to exhibit the lady and her costume to the greatest advantage. As the lady sits down, however gently, it yields to the pressure, leaving her surrounded by the portion not pressed, which thus forms a background, and, as it were, a frame to the living picture. When she rises the elastic cushion resumes its pristine form. The least movement is sufficient to cause the seat to rise or fall, and I have often seen ladies amuse themselves with this gentle exercise. To these settees a pad is attached. On a spring being touched this opens, and forms a fan which by its own movement fans the lady, and at the same time emits a refreshing perfume, continuing to act until the lady closes it by touching a spring. These settees are covered with silk of various colours, adapted to the ladies and their costumes; a peculiar crimson ornamented with gold is the favourite colour. They are allowed to be used by the married ladies alone, and are much liked by them, the more so, perhaps, that in the colleges girls of all ranks are not allowed to use any seats but those without backs. Hermes.

A VERY charming Soirée Musicale d'Invitation was given at the Beethoven Rooms on Thursday, April 3rd, by Mrs. J. Holman-Andrews. Mr. Gadsby's cantata, Out of the deep, was exceedingly well rendered, accompanied by the composer, who may be congratulated on the vocally written and tuneful melodies of his work. Ample justice was done it, the choruses steadily and well sung, and the solos, in the hands of Miss Gertrude Holman-Andrews, were charmingly given. Mr. Faringham assisted admirably in the tenor music, and Mr. Gadsby supplied, as far as possible, Miss Edith Holman-Andrew's place in the sweet duet, "I look for the Lord." The latter young lady was unfortunately prevented by a severe cold from singing, a circumstance much regretted, as the sisters have already made their mark as duettists; and beside this, a new song by the younger sister was to be sung by Miss Edith, to which everbody was looking forward to with pleasure. Mdme. Laura Baxter was hors de combat. Nevertheless a very enjoyable and charming selection of music gave great pleasure to all present. The Rev. W. G. Martin M.A., conducted admirably; and we must mention with the highest commendation the two instrumental solos—Mr. Charles Gardiner on the pianoforte, and Mdme. Sidney Pratten on the guitar. Mrs. Holman-Andrews' accompaniments were played with her usual artistic skill.

PROVINCIAL.

LIVERPOOL.—A performance of the Messiah was given at the Amphitheatre on Good Friday, before a large audience. The principals were Madame Billinie Porter, Miss Jessie Bond, Mr. W. B. Ling, and Mr. Alfred Brown, supported by a band and chorus numbering about 120, under the conductorship of Mr. Armstrong. "Too much praise," writes a correspondent, "can scarcely be given to the band for the efficient way in which they accompanied the solos, the piano passages being carefully attended to. The principals acquitted themselves well, the gem of the evening being Madame B. Porter's rendering of 'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' which was enthusiastically encored. Some of the chorus, also, had to be repeated. Mr. Armstrong wielded the bâton with a firmness and steadiness, which might be copied with advantage by many who assume the post of conductor."

EDINBURGH.—The Daily Review, of Monday, April 14, said:—

A large audience assembled in the music class-room of the University on Saturday afternoon, to listen to Professor Oakeley's final organ recital. The programme, as will be seen, was arranged with a special reference to the Easter festival:—"Overture, 'Passione,' Haydn; Chorales (a), 'Christ lag in Todesbanden' (A.D. 1524), (b) 'Jesu, deine Passion' (A.D. 1609), harmonized by Bach; airs from St. Paul (a), 'But the Lord is mindful of his own,' (b) 'Be thou faithful unto death,' Mendelssohn; 'Agnus Dei' (Mass No. 1), Mozart; solo and chorus, 'Though all Thy friends forsake Thee' (Crucifixion), Spohr; 'Cujus animam' (Stabat Mater), Rossini; armonia religiosa, 'Silver trumpets,' &c.; quartett, 'Since by man came death;' chorus, 'By man came also the resurrection of the dead;' quartett, 'For as in Adam all die;' chorus, 'Even so in Christ shall all be made alive;' chorus, 'Worthy is the Lamb' (Messiah), Handel."

EXETER.—The theatre opened on Saturday evening last, under the management of Mr. Frederick Neele, for a short season of twelve nights. The corps dramatique included the following names—viz, Miss Fanny Durrant, Miss Emily Leng, Miss Lizzie Ashmore, Miss Emma Ellis, Miss Clara Hutchinson; Mr. G. W. Harris, Mr. Arthur W. Ricketts, Mr. Robert Mendlicott, Mr. S. Granville, Mr. Walter Cooke, Mr. H. Nelson, Mr. G. Polini, Mr. H. Cremlin, and Mr. E. M. Robson. On Monday, the clever tragedienne, Miss Josephine Fiddes, commenced a starring engagement of eleven representations in Hazlewood's equestrian drama of Lady Godiva.—W. S. J.

WARRINGTON.—On Thursday, the 10th inst., a concert was given at the public hall, before an appreciative audience. The vocalists were Madame Billinie Porter, Miss Jessie Bond, Mr. W. B. Ling, (of Cambridge), Mr. Watson, and Mr. Alfred Brown. Mr. A. Borst was the organist. The various "numbers" in the programme were satisfactorily performed, the singing of the ladies being especially applauded,—the only drawback was that the hall was not better filled.

EDGBASTON.—We take the subjoined from the Birmingham Daily Post, of April 9:—

"The twentieth concert of the Edgbaston Amateur Musical Union took place in the Exchange Assembly Room, on Tuesday, in the presence of a large and fashionable audience. The band of about forty performers, was composed of the members of the society, assisted by some half-dozen professional instrumentalists, including Mr. Humphries, first violin, a lady pianist, two vocal soloists, a glee party, and the members of the local German choir, known as the Liederkranz. Mr. Duchemin, honorary conductor, wielded the bâton. Since the abandonment of Mr. Anderton's Saturday Orchestral Concerts the band of the Edgbaston amateurs has acquired importance as the only local body to which the public can look for a symphony or other orchestral work; and it is gratifying to be able to add that the members appear to be equal to their responsibilities. There is thoroughness about everything they undertake which cannot fail to produce the most satisfactory results, and has already placed them in the first rank of English amateur orchestras. From concert to concert the improvement made is not perhaps easily perceptible, but as compared with their playing a season or two ago, there can be no doubt that the performances of the band on Monday revealed a striking advance. This improvement is the more noticeable from the fact that the orchestra is now dependent to a much less extent than formerly on professional assistance, and its merits and defects are substantially those of the amateurs themselves. Detailed notice of their various performances on Monday night is scarcely called for, but the most effective and creditable effort of the evening was the execution of Beethoven's Symphony, No. 2. This noble work had evidently been rehearsed with care and thoroughness, and its several movements fully mastered. The fine March from Egmont, forming the conclusion of the third entr'acte to Goethe's tragedy, had been arranged for the band by Mr. C. J. Duchemin, and its performance showed the pains that had been bestowed upon it. The overture to Fra Diavolo would have been all the better for an additional rehearsal; but if the ensemble in this instance was not so satisfactory as in other performances, the merits of individual players was even more conspicuous, the solo passages for the cornet and other wind instruments being executed generally with great neatness and finish. Miss Ryland displayed a good expressive style and considerable executive powers, in the pianoforte solos devolving upon her. Mr. Duchemin's new galop de bravura, which furnished the subject of her concluding performance, is a showy, brilliant, spirited piece, combining bright agreeable themes with elaborate and effective harmonic setting. Miss Moore possesses an agreeable soprano voice, not deficient in culture, though wanting in evenness, and her singing of two songs by Beethoven and Bishop was received by the audience with warm marks of favour. Between the parts the members of the German Liederkranz, a choir of male voices, assisted by a few outsiders, sang Strauss's charming Danube Waltz, arranged in quartet, with pianoforte accompaniment by Miss Heritage, and delighted the audience so much by their unity and precision that the performance was encored. Mr. Duchemin conducted throughout with his habitual good judgment."

BALFE'S NEW OPERA.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

In our remarks upon the prospectus of Mr. Mapleson's season at Drury Lane Theatre, we said that the presentation of Balfe's Talisman in a foreign dress would be an event not at all creditable to native art. But while this is undoubtedly true, it is also a fact that the presentation in any shape of a new work by such a composer should excite no ordinary interest. Not having an English stage whereon to place it, we welcome it on that of Italian opera, especially in a theatre associated ever since 1835 with Balfe's fame, and at a time when public attention is directed to the dead composer by the presentation of his MSS. to the British Museum, as well as by the expected "inauguration" of his bust at Drury Lane. But there are other reasons, not, perhaps, very widely known, which go far to make legitimate the connection of his last opera with the Italian stage. Balfe is chiefly recognized in England as the composer of a few popular English works, the fact being ignored or lost sight of that, during his whole life, he not only vindicated the claims of native art, but held a firm and recognised position in the art of Italy and of France. It may be worth while to state some facts in proof of this, and for the earliest we go back as far as 1829, when Balfe produced, at Palermo, his first opera, I Rivali, following it up the next year, at Pavio, with Un Avvertimento di Gelosi, written especially for Ronconi. Enrico IV. was brought out at Milan in 1831, and closed the composer's early labours for the Italian stage. That his first three operas were produced in the form now chosen for his last work is a fact sufficiently noteworthy to call for remark. In 1838, having meanwhile composed The Siege of Rochelle (1835), The Maid of Artois (1836), Catherine Grey (1837), Joan of Arc and Diadeste for Drury Lane, Balfe acquired the distinction of being the first Englishman to write an Italian opera for the Anglo-Italian stage. His Falstaff, the work in question, was played at Her Majesty's Theatre, and the principal parts were sustained by the illustrious quartet—Grisi, Rubini, Tamburini, and Lablache—whose singing is still a favourite theme with every operatic laudator temporis acti. Three years later Balfe wrote Keolanthe, a work destined to be produced at Vienna under his own direction; and in 1842 the gifted composer invaded the French stage with Le Puits d'Amour, an opéra comique which had a remarkable success. That his next opera, The Bohemian Girl, was placed on the Italian stage at Her Majesty's in 1858, with the co-operation of Piccolomini, Giuglini, and Belletti, most readers will have in mind; but it may not be so generally known that the same work was played in the Austrian capital as Die Zigeunerin, and also at Hamburg. In 1844 Balfe again appeared on the French stage, this time with Les Quatre Fils Aymon, which speedily made its way all over the Continent, and, as I Quattro Fratelli, had a "run" at Her Majesty's in 1851—Sophie Cruvelli, Colletti, and Gardoni taking part in its performance. Till this time the doors of the Paris Grand Opéra had been shut against our composer; now, however (1845), they opened for the admission of his L'Etoile de Séville, with which opera, and one other produced at Trieste in 1856, Balfe's direct labours for the foreign theatre came to an end. Not so his successes on the same field, The Bondman (1846) being played at Berlin by special desire of the present Emperor of Germany, and The Bohemian Girl achieving so much success in Paris four years ago that the composer was presented with the cross of the Legion of Honour.

We have given the foregoing particulars of Balfe's connection with other operas than that of England because they have, just now, perhaps, a special interest and significance. In view of them, it is nothing new to see his Talisman announced as Il Talismano, and brought forward in a foreign dress. Moreover, Balfe was a cosmopolitan in art; and, aside from the accident of its composer's birth, his music can hardly be said to have any country. True, for reasons so obvious as not to require stating, his English operas are full of English ballads; but the versatility of his gifts was such that he could adapt himself to the exigencies of whatever position, and be an Italian among Italians, or a Frenchman among Frenchmen. As regards the music of the opera, which is so soon to be heard for the first time, we are not able to say anything from actual knowledge; but there are reasons for anticipating a work of special excellence. It was the misfortune of our composer that the demands upon him were incessant, and that he could meet them with facility and success without doing entire justice to his rare gifts. The Talisman, however, is the fruit of Balfe's ripest years and most studied art. He began the opera in 1865, doing his work with, for him, such unexampled deliberation that he had not quite finished it when death unhappily called him away. Under circumstances so unusual, much may be expected; while the interest shown in The Talisman by Sir Michael Costa will secure a careful and efficient performance. As is generally known, the part of Edith Plantagenet will be sustained by Madame Nilsson, who, we doubt not, esteems herself honoured by association with artists such as Sontag, Cruvelli, Viardot, Alboni, Stolz, and Piccolomini, all of whom have sung Balfe's music on the Italian stage.

In the course of these remarks nothing has been said about Balfe's English career, because that is still fresh in the memory of his countrymen. What we desire is to excite public sympathy in favour of the last work of a gifted countryman, and to show, with that object in view, how far he has a claim to more than the limited honours of a purely national composer.

REVIEWS.

Chappell & Co.

Off to the Country. Morceau de Salon pour le Piano. Par Arthur Polinski.

This is a timely publication, even though "Society" has not yet ceased to cry "Off to the Town." When the trees are showing their fresh young leaves, and the primroses are peeping out on every bank, thoughts of the country will arise, whatever fashion may say as to the superior attractions of a crowded salon. The music before us is showy and effective in its way—just such music, in regard to joyousness and brilliancy, as thoughts of the country should inspire.

Sir Ronald the Rover. Song. Written by Frederic May. Composed by B. W. Horner.

The Sir Ronald here named seems to be a kind of glorified pirate belonging to the Viking order. At any rate, he sails away on some expedition, leaving a lady behind him, thoughts of whom induce his return earlier than was at first intended. He finds the lady faithful to him, and we are obliged to conclude that they both live happily ever afterwards. The music is conventional in its character, but well written and full of spirit. We should not be surprised to find "Sir Ronald the Rover" become a great favourite among amateurs.

A Merry Peal. Valse Joyeuse par Jules de Sivral.

This is a very pretty morceau de salon full of pleasant tune, and no less pleasant effects. M. de Sivrai knows how to write even trifles with musicianly skill, and in the piece before us he has put forth all his power. It is by no means difficult, for which reason it may safely be recommended to young amateurs who desire to make the most of their present ability.

Original Voluntaries for the Organ or Harmonium. Composed by George Forbes.

When a composer sets to work upon music intended for such very different instruments as the organ and harmonium, he, of course, places himself at a considerable disadvantage, and can hardly hope to succeed in producing music equally adapted for both. Mr. Forbes's pieces, however, may be played on both with considerable effect, and will prove of great use in the numerous churches which boast, if not a harmonium, at most but a small organ. The voluntaries are agreeably diversified as to style, but all are essentially religious and quite fitted for service use. We commend them without hesitation as adapted to supply a want very generally felt. The book contains sixteen pieces of convenient length.

Serenade. (Ch. Gounod.) Transcribed for the Pianoforte by W. Kuhe.

M. Gounod's well-known melody is here treated in Mr. Kuhe's best style. It makes a pretty and effective drawing-room piece.

Babil and Bijou. Fantasia. Introducing the popular songs, "Bijou," "Faces in the Fire," and the celebrated Spring Chorus. Arranged for the Pianoforte by W. Kuhe.

The title of this piece is its own recommendation. Everybody knows more or less of the Babil and Bijou melodies, and every young lady pianist will hasten to possess herself of Mr. Kuhe's effective but not difficult transcription.

Boosey & Co.

Remember or Forget. Song. Words and Music by Hamilton Aidé.

We have here a simple story of wrecked hopes and disappointed love, illustrated by simple but expressive music. The song is one of those which are sure of a welcome whenever decently sung, and which are so easy that to sing them decently involves no special requirements save earnest feeling for the theme.

Love and Tears. Ballad. Written by C. L. Kenney. Music by W. F. Taylor.

Mr. Taylor studies great simplicity in all his music, and the piece before us shows that he knows how to attain his object. A little more originality and distinctiveness would have improved the song; but amateurs who care nothing for either one or the other will find no difficulty in giving their approval.

St. James's Pianoforte and Music Company.

The Song of the Fern. Written by George Ker. Music by W. M. Graham.

The words of this song are quite unworthy of the subject. Here is an example, by way of proof:—

"Deep in the valley, hid from view,
Where scented hawthorns grow,
The sheep and kine oft passed me by
To drink from the stream below.
See how they prize my foliage green,
The poor me sometimes buy,
I adorn the proudest in the land,
Though mark'd a fern am I."

When a composer puts music to such stuff as this he deserves not to succeed, and we are bound to say that Mr. Graham has not succeeded, unless his object was to write down to the poet's level.

J. B. Cramer & Co.

The Songs of Wales (Part I). With Accompaniments for Piano or Harp. Edited by John Thomas (Pencerdd Gwalia).

This edition of Welsh songs contains the music of the principality, as it appeared in the publications of the late John Parry, George Thomson, and others; and when the same air is given by Parry and Thomson, with different words and accompaniments, both copies are re-produced. Mr. John Thomas's work as editor is to furnish each number with at least one song, hitherto unpublished in a vocal form, and, also, to write historical and traditional notes, as well as a preface on the Bards, Bardic Institutions, and Minstrelsy of Wales. It will be gathered from this that the publication is one of considerable importance and value to all who set store by national music. The first part—first of twelve—promises well. It is very cheap, capitally printed, and contains twelve songs, of which three are given with Haydn's accompaniments, the others being arranged by Parry, Purday, and the editor.

The Spinning Song. From Wagner's opera, Der fliegende Holländer. Arranged for the Pianoforte by Jules Brissac.

The prettiest piece in all Wagner's operas, deserves to become widely known, and M. Brissac has adapted it for the pianoforte in excellent style. The adaptation makes a really capital drawing-room solo, and as such we commend it without reserve.

A. Hammond & Co.

Souvenir de Marie Thérese (1663). Gavotte Favourite pour Piano. Par Ch. Neustedt.

The popularity of Gluck's Gavotte in A has caused quite a run upon that form of movement, and we are somewhat in danger of having a little too much of it. The work before us is decidedly more modern in style than the music of 1663, and we are disposed to think that it never had much to do with Marie Therese. But, in any case, the Gavotte is pretty and interesting, qualities sufficient to recommend it whatever may be the date of its composition.

Leipziger Lerchen. Waltzes. By Josef Gung'l.

Any dance music from Herr Gung'l's pen is welcome, even when, as in this case, he scarcely comes up to his highest standard. The German composer's least successful efforts invariably display merit sufficient to warrant us in giving them a recommendation.

Frieden's Palmen. Waltzes. By Kéler Bela.

A fairly tuneful and thoroughly dansante set of waltzes. They are easy to play.

C. Lonsdale.

The First Rose of Summer. Song. Words by Arthur Matthison. Music by Cesare Vaschetti.

Mr. Matthison's address to the first rose of Summer does not equal that of Moore's to the last; but its intention is good. The music aims at, and achieves, simplicity; both theme and accompaniments being as unambitious as possible. For this reason the song lies well within the means of the least educated amateur, and will probably find acceptance as a true "home song."

The only novelty in the libretto is the abolition of duets, trios and cavatinas according to the old forms, a fact which appears more plainly in the music than in the book. And here I come to Wagner's highly vaunted merit, for which the most stubborn feel disposed to award him the palm as an innovator. In Lohengrin, if we except the quintet, which is, perhaps, the finest piece in the opera, and which is cast in the forms used by everyone, we do not meet a cavatina, properly so-called, a duet, a trio, or a concerted piece in the manner of the other composers of the present day. But is this a circumstance over which we ought to rejoice? Or is it not rather equivalent to going backwards several centuries, and to making musical art what it was at first, when, scarcely emerged from the naves of the church, it still preserved the character of the sacred melopea? This was about the fourteenth century, as musical historians inform us, and it is in this period that we must look for Wagner's predecessors; but there was then a magnificent justification of the form, namely, the poverty of art, while in Wagner, on the other hand, it can have none but the poverty of the artist. Cavatinas, duets, trios and concerted pieces were looked upon as gradual conquests of music; they are nothing but forms of acknowledged beauty, in which the melody is exhibited to the best advantage. To suppress them would be to destroy the work of ages. What would be said of a poet who would admit nothing but blank verse, and desired to abolish rhyme, on the pretext that no one speaks in rhyme; to abolish the sonnet, asserting it to be the Procustesian bed of poetry, in which the thought is obliged to be truncated and diluted in fourteen verses; and to abolish the eight-line stanza, the six-line stanza and the three-line stanza as so much old rubbish? The cavatina, the trio and the duet, are respectively the strophe, the canzona and the ode of music; let us assume that cadences, against which it has, for some time past, been the fashion to wage war, are the poor rhymes; carry out consistently the fine crusade, and, in music as in poetry, you will leave nothing but accent—that is to say, declamation. This is what Wagner has done for music; poetry still awaits its Wagner.

It is said: "The trio, duet, and cavatina, in the modern style, are injurious to dramatic probability." Even were this true, they would be justified, because to suppress them would be injurious to music; but it is not true that they are. In the recent operas of Meyerbeer, Verdi, Gounod, and a hundred other celebrated composers, we have seen the situations logically developed by the system of duets, trios, and concerted pieces. Let us suppress cabalettas, repetitions, ritornellos, embellishments, and everything which, dallying only with the music, ruined the drama; such things were the natural excess resulting from the development of musical art; but, while correcting one excess, do not, for pity's sake, let us fall into the contrary excess and sacrifice the music to the drama. The modern repertory of our own great composers, and of the great composers of every country—of really great composers—has shown how far reform may go without becoming destruction. Even Wagner himself cannot altogether renounce conventionalisms, because, if he did, he would have to do away with all pieces in unison, for they are after all nothing but a fiction; and if anyone begins justifying the choruses of Wagner, he must by the same rule, justify the quartets and trios of Meyerbeer and of Verdi; if we would condemn the ones, we must end by annihilating entirely that grand creation, modern melodrama.

But it would take too long to discuss Wagner as a reformer. I will turn to Wagner as a composer. Before I had an opportunity of hearing Lohengrin, certain home and foreign critics had filled my head with an account of the miraculous virtue of the Reformer's music. The more reasonable among them—who were, however, suspected of heresy by the immaculate—gave me to understand that Wagner's operas really contained much that was wearisome, but that the weariness experienced was compensated by beauties such as no composer ever did write, or ever will be able to write; in support of their assertion, they cited the two preludes of Lohengrin, and the chorus on the arrival of the Swan. This verdict, which looked like a concession, was accepted in good faith even by the opponents of this kind of music. Well, I swear that I will let any one cut off the end of my finger, if this also is not a mirage produced by the fatigue of the traveller in a flat, sterile region of recitatives, where sustained notes, violin-tremolos, and trumpet sounds are the only things which grow, and where the traveller never feels the fresh wing of a melodic zephyr brush across his face. A patient companion of mine said, at the first performance, that, when a man traverses a desert, whether of Sahara or of Lohengrin, if he comes up to only a puddle and four leaves of salad, for which, to render thanks to an all-merciful Heaven, he kisses the sand which is scorching his feet. The comparison will appear irreverent and sacrilegious; but sacrilegious people have never done the harm that may be produced by common-place ejaculations, the result of blind enthusiasm, superseding the judgment. I do not for a moment doubt the good faith of the Wagnerites; but it is time to declare openly, and I do declare, that in this same Lohengrin there is nothing superhuman, marvellous, or gigantic; whatever it contains which is fine, is fine, and nothing more than fine. If we come to examples, which the Wagnerists in the brutality of their feticism repudiate, I do not know any musician who would not give the two preludes in Lohengrin, and something more, for the overture to Dinorah; and, as regards dramatic and descriptive music, I am not sure that in this opera of Wagner's there is a single piece to be placed side by side with the incantation scene in Der Freischütz; or, as regards concerted pieces, anything that does not pale before the dagger scene of Les Huguenots, or the chorales of Le Prophète.

Let the reader observe that I am citing German names, so that I may not expose myself to the charge of idolatry, which I have preferred against the Wagnerites. In the grandiose pieces of Lohengrin, the best part is always the effect of sonority; the novelty consists entirely in the cymbals, which stun us. What is really fine is in the orchestration; but the substance is not much if you divest it of all its paraphernalia, and inspiration does not constitute a thousandth part of the ingredients of these miracles. I will mention the best piece in Lohengrin—the Quintet of the first act, which the public applauded unanimously—and I ask whether we have not hundreds of larghi of the same pattern in our repertory at home, and whether Mercadante, Verdi, Meyerbeer, and Donizetti, have not written a hundred times in the same style, only with a better motive. But motives cause the Wagnerites to smile with pity. Wagner does not thus disdain them; if he finds one, or half a one, he presses it to his heart, and never relinquishes his grasp of it; he caresses it as he would a darling little son, who, intimidated by his father's learning, wants to run away; he proves by his behaviour the truth of what others have already said on various occasions: It is not Wagner who will not have anything to do with melodic ideas, but melodic ideas which will not have anything to do with Wagner.

Leaving out of consideration the miraculous pieces, we all agree about the rest; it is wearisome, insupportably wearisome. The music ought, at least, in the recitative, to move nervously, to be agitated, to writhe, to follow with hasty steps the passions, and to give a colour to the sentiments of the characters; but it does nothing of the kind; it is one continuous and uniform movement, almost always largo; one inexhaustible monotony of clarionet groans and violin whisperings, interpolated, now and then, by some trumpet sound or other, and, though somewhat more parsimoniously, by the harsh clash of the cymbals. It is a picture in which the figures are neglected for the general tint of the background, and, unfortunately, the tint of the background is of a fog colour. "The instrumentation is most learned," they say. I do not constitute myself a judge of that; I merely go by my own impressions and those of the public, and I affirm that such learning is oppressive, and would make us bless a little of our own dear ignorance, which, instead of seeking out the algebraic sense of man, is contented with the modest portion of his heart.

However, learned or not learned, one thing is evident: the abuse of the same means to obtain effects, and the really puerile straining for the latter. I may mention the piece in the second act with the effect of a reply in the distance, repeated five times; a composer made of common stuff would have been contented with three, but Wagner is not made of common stuff, and had an excellent reason for repeating the reply five times, namely——that no one had ever repeated it more than three. It would be easy to mention this or that opera, where effects or modes are repeated even oftener, but it would not be easy to mention one where the repetition occurs without any need for it, scenic, dramatic, or musical. Now, either I do not know what I am saying (which is most probably the case in the eyes of incurable Wagnerites), of this useless repetition, this painful endeavour to attain something which is unattainable, this abuse of sonorous effects, is nothing more or less than poverty. It is the poverty of a man of powerful mind—this I readily admit—but, for goodness' sake, do not utter the word: genius, for genius means, above everything, riches; not simply riches of learning, which may be amassed by study, but riches which come ab intestato from Heaven, and which study teaches a man to spend appropriately. For anyone who does not allow himself to be misled by what he has heard, or by what he has seen in his dreams, the Wagnerian Colossus is nothing more or less than a man of strong mind, who desires something he does not possess, namely: genius, and who, while feeling he has the strength of Samson, knows he has a bandage over his eyes, and pines away at the idea of his own impotence. This explains many things; among others, and above all others, the nervous arrogance of his spiteful disposition, and the supreme contempt with which Wagner affects to speak of all the grapes as unripe. We know that he who cannot do what others do is strong only in despising their efforts.

Real genius, robust and fruitful, can admire, because it can create; admiration is a kind of creation on our part of other men's works.

But there is another truth connected with the faith revealed by Wagner to his disciples, and through them transmitted to us, namely: the supreme difficulty of perceiving the hidden beauties in the great Reformer's music. According to certain criticisms, his music is an impasto, or mixture, of darkness and light, in which, at first, we see only the darkness, but whence there emerge gradually beautiful forms, tenderness, and bright flashes, which even hurt the optic nerve.

"So great"—a Belgian critic lately proclaimed to the world—"so great is the delight of perception that it becomes pain."

"And delirium," he should add.

To no one who possesses a certain amount of musical experience did the music of Lohengrin appear difficult or abstruse; as for myself, the more I opened my eyes, the more I beheld the void in it. I may be short-minded and short-sighted—I always had a suspicion that such was the case, and it would not strike me as a novelty were anyone to tell me so—I may be short-minded and short-sighted; but, till my mental and visual deficiencies prevent me from seeing the miracles of Italian and German genius, while they cause me to kneel before every altar at which some musical god of yesterday or to-day is worshipped, and abandon me only before the altar erected to Wagner, allow me to keep my tears for some other affliction, and to remain indifferent to this one.

I can very well explain, however, the good faith of the Wagnerites, for whom every glance cast into the darkness of Lohengrin or Tannhäuser reveals some fresh beauty, causing them to weep for joy. It is a very natural physiological and psychological phenomenon. There was a time when all Wagnerites, like the rest of mankind, were children; if they ever did what I used to do myself, and what, also, several of my most intimate colleagues of twenty years since used to do, they will recollect that, shutting their eyes and keeping them closed a certain period, they beheld a hundred pretty things. At first all was a black vacuum, but then there were strange circles, and then curious shapes, mountains and seas, just as in Wagner's music—it was something perfectly charming; I never saw anything so beautiful with my eyes open. It is certain that the fanatical admirers of Wagner judge with their eyes shut, taking for something absolutely true that which their own fancy thinks it beholds, and accepting that which is a purely subjective phenomenon as the authentic work of their master.

In the same fashion, the faithful see the eyes of Madonnas move. Balzac tells a little story, which is a perfect gem, concerning a kind of pictorial Wagner. This reformer having abolished a couple of trifles—outline and shade—painted a picture before which he went into ecstacies for years, without letting anyone else see it; the day on which he showed it to his friends, who could perceive in it nothing but blotches, the poor fellow went mad and died. Had he only met with a dozen adepts, he would have founded a school, and, at the present day, we should possess Painting of the Future as a companion to music of the same period.

I conclude my long prattle by saying that I am most delighted at having had a close view, and seeing what Wagner is, because it will teach me and a thousand others to hold more dear, and think more highly of, our own great composers. S. Farina.

SACRISTAN AND LYRIC ARTIST.

By Ferdinand Gumbert.*

In the afternoon of the 5th January, 1842, the manager, Herr Spielberger, entered my room quite unexpectedly. It must, I knew, be something particularly important he wished to communicate, because, when he had anything to say in the way of business to the members of his company, he usually sent the messenger to beg they would call upon him in his room at the Theatre, or at his private house. He gave me no time to put any questions but said without further ado:

"Can Formes sing Sarastro to-morrow evening?"

"To-morrow evening?"

"Yes, to-morrow evening. You know that to-morrow is a festival here in Cologne—that of the Three Kings? I must give an opera, and can give only Die Zauberflöte. But, as it has been performed several times lately, I want, in order to ensure a full house, some especial attraction. If Formes sings, all Cologne will flock to the Theatre. Is he ready?"

"Perfectly."

"Very well, then you arrange all the rest, while I look after the bills of the day and the advertisements in the papers; we must not lose a minute. How about rehearsals?"

"Well, I think we might have one with piano at 9 o'clock to-morrow morning, and one at 10 upon the stage."

"Very good, I leave all to you."

Directly the manager had disappeared, I wrote to Formes as follows:

"Dear Formes,—To-morrow evening you will appear as Sarastro. Be at my place at 7 o'clock to-morrow morning, so that we may once go through the part, music and dialogue. There is a pianoforte rehearsal at 9, and a stage-rehearsal at 10."

I took these lines to the Post Office, whence a coach left every hour with letters and passengers for Mühlheim.

According to the appointment made in my letter, Formes appeared punctually at 7 o'clock on the morning of the 6th January, at my rooms, having walked the distance from Mühlheim to Cologne. His eye beamed with delight at having reached the goal of his wishes; but not the slightest sign of anxiety or excitement was visible in his demeanour.

After we had been through the part, which went off without a fault, we proceeded to the theatre. Formes had gradually made the acquaintance of all the members of the company, so that he received a friendly welcome from everyone. In his daily intercourse, moreover, he had become closely attached to my dear friend and colleague, August Thomas, and myself, following our advice like an obedient child.

The pianoforte rehearsal was succeeded by the rehearsal on the stage at ten o'clock. The result was a complete success, so that, immediately afterwards, the manager, Herr Spielberger, concluded with Formes a three years' engagement, at a rising salary.

Formes then set out, again on foot, to return to Mühlheim, re-appearing at 5 o'clock p.m., in my room, after having once more walked the distance. Having rested half-an-hour, we both —for I myself sang Papageno that evening—started for the Theatre.

I need hardly say that the announcement at the top of the play-bill (the latter is lying before me as I write these reminiscences):

"First appearance on any stage of
"HERR FORMES
"of Mühlheim,"

had filled the house to the ceiling. Everyone wanted to see the Mühlheim Sacristan as Sarastro. Hundreds were turned away from the doors, unable to obtain admission.

That I felt the importance of the evening more than Formes did, and that, in consequence, I was most uneasy and absent during my scenes of the first act, is a fact for which the reader may take my word. The time previous to Sarastro's appearance in the finale struck me as fearfully long. At length the moment came; my heart beat as though it would burst. Formes entered as calm and unembarrassed as ever; he looked magnificent; his strongly marked features with his expressive eye, and black hair falling down his back, his well-knit, imposing figure, seemed made expressly for the part. In the auditorium, where —as is always the case on such occasions—the restlessness of curiosity and expectation had up to then predominated over every thing else, you might have heard a pin drop.

But, after the very first vocal passage: "Steh' auf, erheitre dich, o Liebe," with the low "doch," the applause roared like a hurricane through the house, and, after the first act, there was a tumultuous call for Formes. When the curtain went down, Formes fell upon my neck, and wept copiously. The conductor, Kreutzer, and Herr Spielberger, the manager, did not allow the success of the pupil's first appearance to make them forget the teacher. They paid me the most flattering compliments. The second act began. Formes had recovered his composure. He spoke his long speech in a distinct and dignified manner, and sang the following numbers, as I was accustomed to hear him sing them, without a fault and in the finest voice. Of course, he was rapturously applauded. After the performance, we supped together, and Formes again set out for Mühlheim. So ended the 6th January, 1842. In the subsequent thirty years, up to the present hour, I have seen many a début, but not one so brilliant and so full of promise as that of Carl Formes.

Formes experienced no difficulty in obtaining his discharge from his previous post, so that he was able immediately to enter upon the fulfilment of his engagement as a member of the Stadt-theater, Cologne. But I had reserved the right of choosing the parts in which he was to appear next, so that we might not loose, by over-haste, the fruit of so great a success. Unfortunately, I was not able to act any longer as Formes's friendly adviser; I was myself destined to enter upon a fresh career. My first songs were written in Cologne, and, when sung by Formes, met with so favourable a reception, that Kreutzer urged me to devote myself exclusively to composition. As my engagement in Cologne expired on the 1st May, I resolved to return to Berlin, and study music zealously. I have never regretted so doing, and cherish a faithful and loving feeling of gratitude towards poor old Kreutzer, who died at Riga, in 1849.

Under my guidance still, Formes sang the Hermit (Der Freischütz); the Commander (Don Juan); Oroveso (Norma); Sir George (I Puritani); and Gaveston (La Dame Blanche), with equal success. On the 2nd May, 1842, I bade farewell to Cologne and the stage. Formes and Thomas accompanied me to the steamboat, and waved their adieus as the vessel glided away. In several letters which he wrote to me in Berlin, Formes complained that no one would study his parts with him so patiently and conscientiously as I had been in the habit of doing. Then —as is the way of the world—his letters stopped, and to learn his subsequent fate, his successes in Vienna, London, St. Petersburgh, and New York, I had to consult the papers.

It was not till ten years later, in December, 1852, on the occasion of a short engagement at the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, that I was destined to see Formes again. Strange to say, his first part was Sarastro. But even before his public appearance I observed, to my regret, a very great change for the worse in his manner. The good natured honest fellow was merged in an arrogant, dogmatical actor, who was ashamed of the "Sacristan" of former times, and gave himself out—even in my presence—as a Heidelberg student, who had been expelled from his university. In beerhouses, too, he was very fond of narrating his heroic deeds at the Vienna barricades, in 1848.

That I was anxious to see him again on the stage after a lapse of ten years, is a fact which everyone will easily understand. Next me in the pit of the Operahouse stood my friend and Cologne colleague, Thomas, who for many years had then been a member of the Theatre Royal. At length Sarastro appeared. Formes's voice was yet vigorous; it had lost compass in the lower notes, but had gained two upper ones. His vocal style had contracted from the Italians, with whom he had sung, much that was good, and also a great deal that was bad—especially a faulty legato. But what had formerly moved me even to tears in the simple Mühlheim Sacristan: the wondrous timbre, the full, soft tone, the unaffected and touching delivery—all this was out of the power of the world-renowned singer to offer me. During the evening my neighbour on several occasions nudged my arm, and whispered: "That was a tone of days gone by."

Formes's performance was, however, a great success; the "Heiligen Hallen" air had to be repeated in obedience to a tumultous encore. But what would the audience have said, had they been able to hear it sung as the Mühlheim Sacristan sang it ten years previously?

NICOLO ISOUARD.

An Episode in the Life of an Artist.*

The Hôtel de Salme, at the end of the Consulate, and the commencement of the Empire, was one of the most magnificent in Paris, and of the most frequented by the world of fashion.

In 1800, a large number of persons met there to hear a perfectly new opera (Le Tonnelier), by a young composer of great talent, though as yet but little known. Artists and amateurs were enchanted with it. Among the audience was M. Ouvrard, then the richest banker in Paris. In his enthusiasm he never ceased applauding the young composer, then twenty-four years of age. It was very late at night before M. Ouvrard left. To reach his carriage he had to pass through the courtyard of the hôtel. In so doing he saw accidently a piece of paper upon the ground. Its form, as well as the seal attached to it led him to suppose it was a summons. To pick it up and get into his carriage, was the affair of an instant. He had scarcely arrived at his own hôtel before he examined the paper. It was a summons, leaving the person no alternative but to pay at once the sum due, or be lodged at Clichy, the debtors' prison. M. Ouvrard read the summons through, and was surprised to find in it the name of the composer of Le Tonnelier.

The debt was 3,000 francs, and for a sum so trifling—in the eyes of a banker—the future of a young and talented artist, at the outset of his career, was on the point of being gravely jeopardised. M. Ouvrard, a man of generous sentiments, determined this should not be, and, the next day, wrote the artist the following letter:—

"Do not be anxious, my dear sir; the paper you lost, yesterday evening, at the Hôtel Salme, has fallen into good hands. The finder is delighted at a circumstance which enables him to be useful to a young man whose talent he appreciates. Make yourself easy with the thought that you no longer owe your creditors anything. The person in question begs you, also, to excuse him for having taken the liberty of reading the document without your permission. He feels a great interest in your future, and, knowing that there are frequently in an artist's life material obstacles which prevent him from developing his powers, he begs you to accept the ten bank notes, each for 1,000 francs, accompanying this letter. Do not thank him for what in his eyes is merely a small sum on account of your future success."

This letter was addressed to Nicolo Isouard, afterwards so celebrated as the composer of the operas Cendrillon and Jaconde. Cendrillon was performed, in 1810, a hundred times successively.

The two pieces brought Isouard in more than 150,000 francs. while the management gained more than 1,000,000 for their share.

A short time afterwards, Isouard died at the age of 42—died of jealousy at seeing the preference evinced by the public for Boieldieu, who, also, pursued by the bailiffs in 1800, left his widow and children a considerable fortune, independently of his author's rights, which may be valued at 18,000 francs annually.

It is remarkable that this episode in an artist's life, and likewise Isouard's precarious position at the commencement of his career in the French capital, has never been mentioned in any of his known biographies. That of M. Fétis alone (Vol. iv, p. 404, 2nd edition) alludes to it in the following lines:

"After the capitulation of Malta, General Vaubois, who knew Isouard, and was very kind to him, advised him to go and settle in Paris, taking him with him as his secretary. On reaching Paris, Isouard found a devoted friend in Rodolphe Kreutzer, who aided him with his purse, &c."

We have taken the episode just related from a work published, in 1853, at Hamburg, under the title of Fünfzig Jahre in beiden Hemisphären (Fifty Years in the two Hemispheres), by V. Notte.

PETERSEN.

WAIFS.

We are informed that Madame Bulli-Paoli, who, last week, appeared as Leonora in the Favorita, only took the Royal Italian Opera as a step en route for the United States, where she has an engagement.

A careful discipline prevails in all matters relating to the education of girls of every rank, but as soon as they attain one amongst the higher positions and marry, they are allowed, nay, encouraged, to indulge in many luxurious habits, to dress beautifully, and to wear magnificent jewels, but only according to their means.—"Another World."

Gluck's Armida has been revived at Berlin.

Handel's Messiah is in rehearsal at Constantinople.

The Lohengrin failure at Milan cost the management 50,000 lires.

M. Faure plays in Brussels from the 18th to the end of the present month.

La Fille de Mdme. Angot reached its fiftieth representation on Saturday last. The house was crowded.

About the 25th of this month the Opera Comique will produce a new three-act work by M. Delibes, entitled Le Roi l'a dit.

M. Merelli, it is said, has given up directing opera-houses, and will be succeeded, at St. Peterburgh and Moscow, by M. Gaetano Ferri.

Mr. Murat Halstead, of the Cincinnati Commercial, has discharged the inaccurate printer who made him say of Mario, "Hail, king of terrors," when he meant "tenors."

The elder Booth had a broken nose. A lady once remarked to him, "I like your acting, Mr. Booth, but, to be frank with you, I can't get over your nose." "No wonder, madam," replied he, "the bridge is gone."

Poor Mr. Nelson Varley! An unfavourable critic in America has discovered that he suffers from "constriction of the base of his tongue." We have not heard whether Mr. Varley has booked his place in a return Cunard.

M. Offenbach has accepted for his theatre (La Gaîté), a drama in verse, entitled Jeanne d'Arc, the work of M. Jules Barbier. The music, by M. Gounod, comprises twelve choruses, two marches, two ballades, a chanson, and a divertissement.

Herr Saro, conductor of the German regimental band which took part in the Boston Festival, has been sued by his men for keeping to himself more than his share of the money. The court pronounced in favour of the men, and Herr Saro has had to disburse.

A commemorative tablet is to be affixed to the house in Berlin which Spontini inhabited from 1820 to 1842. Some such thing should be done in our own Great Portland Street, where Weber died; in Brook Street, where Handel lived; and in Great Pulteney Street, where Haydn lodged.

The "Student-Union" of the University of Delft will celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of its formation with a festival, beginning on the 10th of July. The principal works to be performed are Judas Maccabæus, the "Erlkönigstochter," by Niels W. Gade, and Schumann's "Neujahrslied." Madame Lemmens-Sherrington is to take the soprano parts.

A pianoforte maker, M. Petitclerc, has invented a new form of instrument. The part containing the strings is placed against the wall, the performer sitting with his back to it, and his face to the audience, at a keyboard which takes up very little room. The novelty has been examined and reported upon very favourably by MM. Thomas, David, Massé, Saint-Saens, Sax, and Cavaillé-Coll.

In its report of a recent performance of Rigoletto, by Mr. Mapleson's operatic company, at the Queen's Theatre, Manchester, an influential local paper has the following:—

"Mdlle. di Murska was a most charming Gilda. She had greater scope than in the opera on Wednesday night, and her performance on Thursday evening was a triumph from beginning to end."

Our correspondent at Vienna writes that the operatic season has been most brilliantly successful, Madame Adelina Patti having attracted crowded and enthusiastic audiences. The gifted prima donna has sung already in La Traviata, La Sonnambula, I Puritani, Il Trovatore, Lucia, and Rigoletto, and each night the receipts have been over £1,000. The Emperor and the Archduchess Gisella honoured the first performance of I Puritani with their presence, and on each occasion innumerable bouquets and frequent recalls proved the genuine success achieved by the artist. Madame Patti has also sung in a grand concert for the Concordia, a society for the relief of poor journalists, the receipts realized amounting to £1,200.

Under the head of "Our Musicians," a correspondent of the Standard writes:—

"I should much like to see the hulking idle fellows who infest our suburban fields made amenable to the recent Act; but unfortunately, the spreading of their nets and paraphernalia is not per se an offence, though if the intent for which the nets are spread succeeds, then, according to the Act, an offence has been committed, for which the loafers may be fined. They must also give their proper Christian names, surnames, and place of abode to any person requiring them, or may be separately fined for default. Notoriously, however, the efforts of most of these persons are directed to the capture of larks, and larks—at least such as we have—are omitted from the Act. Thus our really best musicians are totally bereft of the benefit of Parliament. Cannot some of your readers, who have time to enjoy constant strolls, watch the opportunity of witnessing a capture, and if it be not a lark (most of our other birds are in the schedule), summon the offender, or, at any rate, secure his name and address with a view to proceedings? And cannot some of our legislators extend the benefit to our beautiful larks by a short supplemental Act?"

MUNICH.—There is a report in certain circles anxious for a change, that Herr von Perfall is about to resign the post of Intendant of the Theatres Royal, and that he will be succeeded by Herr von Baligard, a half-pay captain and red-hot Wagnerite. Herr von Perfall, it is said, will be appointed to some other office at Court.—Two amateur performances are being organised this year, on the model of those given last year, by the Wagner Association. The proceeds are to be devoted to the purpose of enabling poor young musicians to attend the performances at Bayreuth. The King has placed the Royal Residenz-Theater at the service of the Association. The pieces selected for representation are the tragedy of Tristan und Isolde, by Hans Sachs; Er macht Visite, by Herr Bauermeister; and an English farce, Borrowed Plumes. For the last, Der Zigeuner is to be substituted the second evening.—Herr and Mad. Vogl have declined an offer from Vienna, and renewed their engagement at the Theatre Royal here, with a joint salary of 20,000 florins.—The King has presented Herr Nachbaur with the costume of Lohengrin. The helmet, armour, and weapons are of solid silver, and the other portions of the dress richly embroidered with the same precious material. Thereupon, a German paper—the Echo—observes that the present of a voice, and proper artistic training, would have been more useful to this Knight of the Puff; for, though fine feathers make fine birds, they cannot make an artist.

OF all that Hermes tells us in his fascinating and engrossing book, called "Another World," perhaps there is nothing more interesting than that which he relates about certain officers whom he denominates "Character Divers." Here is an example:—

"But for the Character Divers the services of numbers of men of extraordinary genius would have been lost to the State, and our world's progress in science, inventions, and happiness, retarded for centuries. Nay, perhaps the then comparative civilization would have been thrown back into barbarism, through the destructive play of bad passions and disappointed hopes. Numbers who, if their early faults had grown into confirmed vices, would later have led a life of crime, and become inhabitants of dungeons and emissaries of evil, now grew into men of great goodness and eminence. The germ of evil propensities was destroyed, the exuberant motive power of their nature regulated and turned to good, by means which the Character Divers thoroughly understood."

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine, (Longman & Co.,) they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from, Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. What joys attend thine advent gay!
On every tree the birdies sing,
From hill and dale glad echoes ring;
The lark, inspir'd, to Heav'n ascends,
The gurgling brook in beauty wends
By mossy bank and grassy brae,
Where violets bloom and lambkins play.
Delightful Spring—sweet month of May
What joys attend thine advent gay!

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so.'—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.
